

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT—Speech of the Lords Commissioners—

The PARLIAMENT was this day Prorogued by Commission.

The LORDS COMMISSIONERS—namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Westbury); The LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of St. Germans); The EARL DE GREY and RIPON (One of the Principal Secretaries of State); The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Viscount Sidney); and The LORD WENSLEYDALE—being in their robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack; and the COMMONS being come with their Speaker, the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills.

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered the SPEECH of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS, as follows:—

" My Lords, and Gentlemen,

" We are commanded by Her Majesty to release you from further Attendance in Parliament, and at the same Time to convey to you Her Majesty's Acknowledgments for the Zeal and Assiduity with which you have applied yourselves to the Discharge of your Duties during the Session of Parliament now brought to a Close.

" Her Majesty commands us to inform you that She greatly regrets that the Endeavours which She made, in concert with The Emperor of the French, The Emperor of Russia, and The King of Sweden, to bring about a Reconciliation between the German Powers and The King of Denmark, were not successful, and that the Hostilities which had been suspended (during the Negotiations) were again resumed. Her Majesty trusts, however, that the Negotiations which have been opened between the Belligerents, may restore Peace to the North of Europe.

"HER Majesty, having addressed Herself to the Powers who were contracting Parties to the Treaty by which the Ionian Republic was placed under the Protectorate of Great Britain, and having obtained their Consent to the Annexation of that Republic to the Kingdom of Greece, and the States of the Ionian Republic having agreed thereto, the Republic of the Seven Islands has been formally united to the Kingdom of Greece, and Her Majesty trusts that the Union so made, will conduce to the Welfare and Prosperity of all the Subjects of His Majesty The King of the Hellenes.

"HER Majesty's Relations with The Emperor of China continue to be friendly, and the Commerce of Her Subjects with the Chinese Empire is increasing.

"HER Majesty has been engaged in concert with The Emperor of Austria, The Emperor of the French, The King of Prussia, and The Emperor of Russia, in an Endeavour to bring to Effect an amicable Arrangement of Differences which had arisen between the Hospodar of Moldo-Wallachia and his Suzerain The Sultan. Her Majesty has the Satisfaction to inform you that this Endeavour has been successful.

"HER Majesty deeply laments that the Civil War in North America has not been brought to a Close. Her Majesty will continue to observe a strict Neutrality between the Belligerents, and would rejoice at a friendly Reconciliation between the Contending Parties.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"HER Majesty commands us to convey to you Her warm Acknowledgments for the liberal Supplies which you have granted for the Service of the present Year, and towards the permanent Defence of Her Majesty's Dockyards and Arsenals.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"HER Majesty has observed with Satisfaction that the Distress which the Civil War in North America has created in some of the Manufacturing Districts has to a great Extent abated, and Her Majesty trusts that increased Supplies of the raw Material of Industry may be expected from Countries by which it has hitherto been scantily furnished.

"THE Revolt of certain Tribes in New Zealand has not yet been quelled, but it is satisfactory to Her Majesty to know that a large Portion of the Native Population of those Islands have taken no Part in this Revolt.

"It has been a Source of much Gratification to Her Majesty to observe the rapid Development of the Revenues of Her East Indian Possessions, and the general Contentment of the People inhabiting those extensive Regions.

"HER Majesty has given Her cordial Assent to many Measures of public Usefulness, the Result of your Labours during the Session now brought to a Close.

"THE Act for extending to Women and Children employed in various Trades the Regulations applicable to Factories in general, will tend materially to preserve the Health and improve the Education of those on whose Behalf it was framed.

"THE Act for authorizing the Grant of Government Annuities will encourage Habits of Prudence among the Working Classes, and will afford them the Means of securely investing the Results of their Industry.

"THE Act for authorizing a further Advance for Public Works in some of the Manufacturing Districts will contribute to alleviate the Distress in these Districts, and will afford the Means of completing many Works of much Importance for the Health of the Population.

"THE Act for giving increased Facilities for the Construction of Railways will diminish the Expenses attendant upon the Extension of those important Channels of Communication.

"It has afforded to Her Majesty the most heartfelt Satisfaction to observe the general Well-being and Contentment which prevail throughout Her Dominions, and to remark the progressive Increase and Development of the National Resources, and to find that, after sufficiently providing for the Public Service, you have been able to make a material Diminution in the Taxation of the Country.

"On returning to your respective Counties you will still have important Duties to perform, essentially connected with the linking together of the several Classes of the Community; and Her Majesty fervently prays that the Blessing of Almighty God may attend your Exertions, and guide them to the Object of Her Majesty's constant Solitude, the Welfare and Happiness of Her People."

UNITED STATES — OUTRAGE ON A BRITISH SUBJECT BY THE FEDERAL AUTHORITIES—CASE OF MR. LEVEY.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Seeing the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his place, I take this opportunity of asking him the Question of which I have privately given him notice, and in regard to which I have furnished him with all the information I have received on the subject, except that contained in a private letter from the brother of the gentleman concerned, and which I shall forward to the noble Earl. If I should fall into any mistake as to the facts the noble Earl will be able to correct me. I am informed that a gentleman of the name of Levey, a British subject, and a merchant at Montreal, recently arrived in Boston by Her Majesty's packet ship Asia. Immediately after her arrival in the harbour she was boarded by a United States marshal who, without any warrant or process whatever, took Mr. Levey into custody. Having been removed on shore, this gentleman telegraphed to a Mr. Myers, a relative, long resident in New York, acquainting him of the circumstance of his sudden arrest; and Mr. Myers subsequently met him in custody of the United States marshal. Mr. Levey was then informed—this was Thursday, the 26th of last month—that he should be brought before the Commissary General for the purpose of examination, but he was still kept uninformed of the charge against him. His papers were taken from him, and he was detained in the prison of New York for a period of ten days, without having been informed of the charge that was against him. At the expiration of that time his papers were restored to him, and he was liberated without the slightest explanation or apology, and up to the present moment he has no idea whatever who his accusers were or of the reason of his arrest. So far from this gentleman having furnished any grounds for suspicion against him by the United States Government, I am informed that the predilections of this Montreal merchant have been always in favour of the Federal Government: whether they are so still, after the treatment which he has received, I cannot pretend to say; but Mr. Levey was, at all events, a gentleman against whom not the slightest charge has ever been brought, and yet upon his arrival in the harbour of Boston he was arrested and confined in a prison for ten days, and then ordered to quit his prison without offer of the slightest reparation or apology. I understand that representations have been made on his behalf to Her Majesty's representative at Washington. I wish to ask the noble Earl whether Her Majesty's Government have been informed of these facts, and, if so, whether the noble Earl has taken any steps to procure reparation or an apology, if they have not been already offered spontaneously by the Government of Washington? Although the inhabitants of the Northern States, in the prosecution of the unhappy and destructive war which is now raging in America, might be willing to sacrifice their own liberties, and subject themselves to a despotic rule, I think that we have a right to insist that our fellow-subjects, when travelling upon their own peaceable and lawful business in the United States, shall not be subjected to such illegal and unconstitutional proceedings as those to which I have called attention—that they shall have the protection of the law, and that such loyal and respectable merchants as Mr. Levey shall not be exposed to the humiliation of arrest and the pain of imprisonment—not to speak of the serious loss which a detention for a period of ten days must necessarily impose upon a merchant travelling about in the ordinary prosecution of his business. I do not mean to say that in the present instance any very serious loss has been sustained; but I think it is a case deserving of the attention of Her Majesty's Government, because if such cases are allowed to pass by unnoticed and disregarded, it is impossible to say to what extent these outrages on British subjects may be perpetrated by the Federal Government.

EARL RUSSELL said, that in the latest despatches from Lord Lyons there was no reference to the case of Mr. Levey. It was very probable that by the next despatches some account of it might be received. When such cases as the imprisonment of British subjects did occur—as they unfortunately did very frequently—Lord Lyons always called the attention of the United States Government to them and required an explanation. In case it appeared that Lord Lyons' attention had not been directed to the case, he would write to him and bring it under his notice.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I cannot help regretting to hear that such cases as the one I have mentioned are of common occurrence in the United States, inasmuch as they certainly have never been communicated to Parliament. The case in question occurred on the 26th of May, and the final release of the gentleman took place on the 6th of June. Having called the noble Earl's attention to this particular case, it only remains for me to express a hope that he will not lose sight of it; but, if the facts as I have stated be correct, that he will seek for an apology and reparation.

EARL RUSSELL: When I said that these cases are of frequent occurrence, I mean that cases of imprisonment are of frequent occurrence. They are not always without reason; for when explanations are required and given, it generally appears that the United States Government have had some reason to believe that the persons imprisoned were engaged in affording assistance to their enemies.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked whether any information had been received from our representative in the United States respecting a somewhat similar outrage committed upon some British subjects found on board the mail packet Scotia? The Scotia was boarded by the Custom House officers at Boston or New York, who searched the passengers' luggage and carried off a number of papers.

EARL RUSSELL said, that as his noble Friend had given him no notice of the question, he could not give him any information on the subject. His noble Friend, however, would remember that the American Government had not agreed with us as to the immunity to be conceded to mail packet ships.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS REMUNERATION, &c. BILL—(No. 120).

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I rise to move the second reading of this Bill, which appears to me of a very important character. It contains provisions of various kinds which my experience in the office I have had the honour to hold has convinced me will be of great importance in the improvement of the law. One of the most important, and that with which the Bill commences, relates to the present mode of remunerating solicitors and attorneys. The vicious manner in which this most necessary and most honourable order of practitioners is remunerated lies at the root of many of the abuses in the administration of the law. Their remuneration bears no reference to the skill, ability, or judgment which each individual employs in his work. The skilled practitioner is paid just the same as the unskilled; and this mode of remuneration, which is recognized by the law, leads directly to the great evils of prolixity, unnecessary verbosity, multiplication of proceedings, delay, and expense. The attorney or solicitor is placed in such a position that in common justice to himself he is obliged to conduct his business not in the way which his skill, judgment, and his own conscience would teach him is the most proper; but in the way which alone will obtain for him the ordinary reward of his exertions. Take the ordinary case of a solicitor employed to draw up a deed of an important character and requiring considerable judgment. If he strung together a number of ordinary forms and legal common-places, he would probably prepare a deed which may extend to 200 folios, and for that prolix verbose instrument he gets ten guineas. Suppose that by great care and judgment he reduces those 200 folios to 100, thereby avoiding great prolixity and uncertainty, he finds that he is only entitled to be paid five guineas; and if by a still greater exercise of judgment he reduces the 200 to 50 folios he gets two guineas and a-half—a sum utterly disproportioned to the professional skill exercised in the preparation of such a document. The attorney is now unable to contract for any business which he may be about to transact; he is unable to apply to any standard by which he may obtain his reward; and he is in all cases compelled to seek his reward for direct services, which are unpaid, indirectly through the medium of long drafts, long pleadings, and a repetition of unnecessary writing. Your Lordships are no doubt aware of the great evils arising from this state of things. It operates injuriously on the public at large and on the profession, but still more injuriously on suitors, who are now unable to make an agreement for a more satisfactory mode of remuneration. These evils have been felt and acknowledged for a very long time; but as is usual with defects in English law, which, however frequently they may have been pointed out, are generally put up with for at least half a century before any earnest endeavour is made to remove them, no redress has as yet been obtained. As long ago as 1840—I might go back to an earlier date for a condemnation of the system—a noble and learned Lord on my left (Lord Brougham) said—

“The other cause of delay and expense is the perfectly faulty mode of remunerating professional men, solicitors especially, but I do not except counsel. This opinion is the result of my whole professional experience and observation, and it is not confined to proceedings in Equity. The subject is one of great difficulty, but it is of yet greater importance, and I feel assured that whatever other changes are effected to improve our system, whether of Equity or Common Law, a large proportion of the evil will remain unless this difficulty shall be grappled with and overcome."

In the Report of the New York Commissioners, published in 1848, there is this statement—

"We cannot perceive the right of the State to interfere between citizens, and fix the compensation which one of them shall receive from the other for his skill or labour. Government is instituted for the preservation of order and the protection of rights. It is not its province to make bargains for the people or to regulate prices. This it assumes to do in respect to the dealings between lawyer and client. It fixes the prices of skill and labour. It has no more just right to do this than it has to fix the price of property; it may prescribe the salary of the clergyman or the fee of the physician with as much reason as the compensation of the attorney."

I do not mean to go as far as to say that the costs of an action shall be measured as between the parties, but I mean to apply the system of this Bill to the whole range of transactions between attorney and client. I desire to emancipate the attorney, and at the same time to emancipate the client, being convinced the result will be that the business will be done in less time, at less cost, with a greater amount of certainty, with a greater amount of skill, and that both parties immediately concerned, as well as the public, will be gainers by the alteration. The evil which exists as between attorney and client is best described by one of the former, who says—

"To give all practitioners an interest in forms and prolixity, and so to tempt them to spin out in every way, instead of lessening, the clerk-work part of their business, manifestly tends to damage the integrity of their minds. But, besides this, it also interposes a difficulty in the way of every improvement. The interest in forms and words begets a bigoted love for forms and words. Whenever a useless form is to be discarded or a simple practice introduced, you are met at once by the attachment, interested or bigoted, of almost the whole profession to that system whereby at present it gets its bread."

In Scotland there has existed for a very long time a system of paying for conveying according to the value of the property. The same rule prevails in France and other countries. I propose to remove from the solicitor the difficulty under which he now labours by means of his not being able to make a specific contract with his client, and to enable him to enter into such a contract and to take security for costs to be incurred, which at present cannot be done. Passing on to the next subject of my proposed enactments, the House is aware that, generally speaking, the absolute owners of property may enter into any contracts they think proper. But with respect to reversions and estates in remainder, there is an arbitrary rule which is still observed by the Courts, much to the disadvantage of owners. Generally the owner of property, who has power of sale, may make his contract irrespective of every consideration of value, and the buyer who buys without fraud may be certain of retaining the subject-matter of his bargain. But Courts of Equity, choosing to exercise a sort of moral supervision over the transactions of mankind, have said that whenever a reversion or remainder is sold the duty shall lie on the purchaser when the life falls in of proving that he gave the value for his purchase. The evil resulting from this interposition on the part of Equity has been pointed out by my noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) in one of his most valuable works. He says—

"It seems, therefore, an Equity not founded on reason or convenience, which in these cases inquires the calculated value of the subject of the contract, instead of its value according to the well known market price. The effect of such an Equity must ultimately be to injure the very persons in whose favour it was introduced. Reversions will never fetch their calculated value. Fair purchasers will not dare to purchase them at their market price, and consequently they will be thrown into the grasp of usurers, who will give very inadequate considerations for them, running the risk of a suit, in which event they will stand in as good a situation as if they had given the fair market price for them."

I am sure your Lordships will agree with me in the conclusion that this was an interposition, to use the language of my noble and learned Friend, "not founded on reason or convenience." The truth is, that you never can use a Court of Justice for the purpose of prescribing to parties either moral rules of conduct or rules of convenience and expediency in the mode of dealing with their property. The existence of this rule is a fertile source of litigation, and renders dealings with property of this description most insecure and most prejudicial to the owner. I propose, therefore, to sweep away this rule by the Bill now before your Lordships, as an interference with the ordinary rights of property which ought never to have been exercised by a Court of Justice. I pass on now to another rule, which is a simple example of the interposition of the Court, and, I think, is productive of the same description of evil—I allude to that rule which relates to the property of married women. By the common law, a husband is invested upon his marriage with all the personal property of his wife, which is either in possession or which he may reduce into possession during the marriage. Such is the rule of the common law. But Equity has taken upon itself to abrogate in effect the common law upon this question. If a married woman becomes entitled to property after her marriage, and if in order to obtain the benefit of that property it is necessary that the husband should go into a Court of Equity, the Court will not interpose unless the husband makes a settlement upon the wife and upon the children of the marriage. Now, that is an interposition which the Court unquestionably had no authority to make. Equity is bound to follow the law, except in cases where good conscience requires that the rule of law should be modified or controlled. But here Equity had no right whatever to interfere. The mode in which it reasoned appears to have been this:—It said, "The principle of the common law is, that the property of the wife is given to the husband provided the husband maintains the wife." Equity, therefore, might with some reason say, "If we find a case in which property accrues during coverture to a wife who is deserted or is not maintained by her husband, we may then interfere to give effect to the implied condition upon which the rule of law giving the wife's property to the husband is founded." But, instead of limiting its interposition to cases of this kind, which might possibly justify such an interposition, Equity has interfered generally, and hence a great amount of litigation, much disturbance to the peace of families, and much uncertainty with regard to property are introduced. It is true that the wife may allow the husband to have the property; but in many cases she is induced by the trustees to stipulate for a settlement, and this is the source of much dispute and ill-feeling. Experience has satisfied me that benefit would arise by putting a stop to the unnecessary interposition of Equity here. If the parties desire a settlement, it is easy for them to make one; but do not force upon them that which ought to be a matter of contract between them, and of contract alone—you have no right to make for competent parties any agreement beyond that which they desire to make for themselves. I pass now to another point, for which I desire the particular attention of your Lordships, and I trust that the alteration which is proposed will be regarded with approbation by the House. There exists in England, in the distribution of a man's property among his creditors after his death, the greatest anomaly and the greatest uncertainty. Your Lordships are aware that a man's property after death is denominated in law by the technical term "assets"—meaning that which is or should be enough for the payment of his debts, or, more properly, property applicable to the payment of debts. These assets are divided by the law into legal and equitable assets; and the difference is, that where the property consists of legal assets certain debts obtain a priority and a preference, while in the case of equitable assets the debts are paid pari passu without distinction. Personality represents legal assets; but if a man charges his freehold estate with payment of his debts, or directs it to be sold for that purpose, the proceeds are equitable assets, and the administration of the estate is governed by different rules. Thus, if A dies leaving legal assets, the property is distributed in one way; if B dies leaving legal and equitable assets, the property is distributed in another way. If a man dies leaving £10,000 in Consols, it is distributed in one way; but if he directs his trustees to raise £10,000 out of his estate, the money is distributed in another way. Your Lordships will recognize at once what a fertile cause of litigation this is, and I propose that such an anomaly should not continue. The history of this distinction is in itself very singular. Debts are divided into specialty and simple contract debts, a specialty debt being evidenced by a writing with a bit of sealing-wax or a wafer, while a simple contract debt may be a promissory note, a bill of exchange, or any paper signed by the party without the wafer or the wax. Now, in ancient times, an act evidenced by writing had a greater value than one which was mere matter of parol evidence; but in those times, writing not being a common accomplishment, persons generally made use of a seal. Thus the seal, which was originally the "signature," became of greater value in the eye of the law as constituting a deed than a simple signature not accompanied by a seal. What reason can there be for such a difference in dealing with simple contract and specialty debts? In Equity no such preference is allowed. Now, the greater number of estates are administered in Equity, and I want the law to be administered in all respects in the same spirit. When a man becomes bankrupt in his lifetime no preference is given in the administration of his estate to specialty debts over simple contract debts. Then why should any such preference be acknowledged in respect of landed property? This, again, is one of those things which it is difficult for any unlearned person to understand. It is one of those numerous anomalies and technicalities which characterize our law, arising from original practices which have long since lost their real value and significance, and which, when examined, it is found do not merit the solemnity which has attached to them. The object of the enactment which I desire to introduce is to bring property in its administration to a simple rule of justice, which requires that all property should be dealt with alike without distinction and without priority of claims, as at present is done in Courts of Equity, leaving still to judgments a certain priority. I will now mention one alteration proposed in the Bill, of a not very material character, with respect to claims for dilapidations. The law as it now stands with respect to these claims is most singular. The succeeding incumbent has a right to sue his predecessor for dilapidations, but all the debts of the preceding incumbent must be paid before the succeeding incumbent's claim for dilapidations is satisfied. I am sorry to say that many instances have been brought before me in which, upon the death of incumbents, their property has been found to be inadequate to satisfy their debts, and consequently the claims for dilapidations have remained unsatisfied. I propose by this Bill to place claims for dilapidations on the same footing as simple contract debts. I will now mention what are the final provisions of the Bill, which, I trust, will meet with your Lordships' approval. At present it is a very difficult thing for a man about to regulate his affairs by will to determine who shall be his trustees. In many cases it is hardly possible for a testator to make a choice with any satisfaction to himself. Many a man leaves his property to his family under circumstances in which he would be glad if there were any public institution in the country to which he could intrust the general management of his affairs—the collection, investment, and distribution of his estate. I therefore propose by the last clause of this Bill to introduce a power, to any person desiring by will or by deed to dispose of his personal estates, to make the Court of Chancery his trustee for the purpose of receiving and administering his estate. I am happy to say that from inquiries I have made, and from letters I have received, the system of administration of estates in the chambers of the Equity Judges is so much better than it used to be, that I will venture to say that an estate is wound up there in less time and at a less cost in nineteen cases out of twenty than it would require if wound up out of Court with the constant aid of a solicitor. I think that this provision will prove of great advantage. With respect to the question of remuneration to the profession, I have received many letters, especially one from the Incorporated Law Society, which expresses the opinion that, subject, of course, to any amendments that may be introduced hereafter, the Bill is entitled to the approbation of that body, as they believe that it is capable of being worked to the great benefit of the profession and of the public. Whatever benefits the solicitor will benefit the client, and whatever benefits both cannot fail to be an improvement of the law and of the general administration of justice.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.—
(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD BROUGHAM said, the Act which he had succeeded in passing had been inoperative on account of the indisposition of those for whose benefit it was intended to avail themselves of its provisions. The noble and learned Lord was understood to say, that although he saw objections to allowing a professional man to act as trustee and solicitor, yet he thought the Bill contained some valuable provisions which were well worthy of consideration.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that the tendency of the law hitherto had been to protect the client against the attorney, who was quite able to take care of himself. At present an attorney or solicitor could not bring an action until he had delivered his bill of costs for one month, to enable the client to consider it and to obtain advice. Parliament had also provided, at a great cost to the country, certain public officers whose function it was to tax the bills of costs sent in by attorneys to their clients. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) sought to make the client's contract with the attorney a specialty debt, although at the time of signing the contract the client could not know the value of the service which he would receive. In a recent case of "Swinfen v. Swinfen," an able and learned counsel undertook to manage Mrs. Swinfen's cause upon a contract that he should receive, if successful, £20,000. He did succeed by his talents, zeal, and ability in winning the cause; but when he claimed the promised remuneration his client had changed her mind and refused to pay. It was a contract that was not binding, and he could not recover upon it. But suppose that instead of a barrister it had been an attorney, what would he have done? He would have done precisely what the counsel did; and if this Bill passed he would recover every single shilling of the contract. But if the Bill did not pass, what then? Whatever fair remuneration he was entitled to receive for his skill and services he would be enabled by law to recover; and he ought not to be able to recover any more. There never was a case in which interference was less called for, or one in which the remedy proposed by his noble and learned Friend would work more mischief. It would strike at all confidence, and would inevitably lead to over-reaching and taking advantage of the client. His noble and learned Friend had not grappled with the difficulty. The difficulty was that the attorney must, for example, be paid according to the length of the deed prepared. If he drew a short deed he was paid so much. There were many good as well as short forms, but an attorney was not paid for reducing a long to a short deed. If, however, the deed was an important one, the attorney only drew instructions, and took them to a conveyancer, who drew the deed; and in that case the attorney charged his client as if he drew the deed, and charged the fee to, counsel as a fee for advice. The effect of the Bill would be to introduce two classes of attorneys; one would submit to the fees allowed, and the other would make all sorts of contracts with their clients. He had the greatest possible respect for the body, and he could not show his respect for them more than by opposing this Bill. He did not believe that attorneys' bills in the present day were of such a character as to place them under any particular difficulty. The next provision of the Bill was that if there were several trustees, and one of them a solicitor, he might with the consent of his co-trustees, or, being sole trustee, by his own authority, act as solicitor and charge his bill of costs to the trust. If he was sole trustee, he might retain himself—he would become, in fact, his own solicitor, and make out his own bill of costs. There was another objectionable feature in the Bill, and it was this—an attorney was not permitted by law to take a security for future litigation, on this ground—that by allowing a solicitor to take such a security expensive litigation might be incurred, over which the client might have no control. It was then proposed to take away from all the women of England, present and future, the right which the law now gave them to participate in the benefit of property acquired by them subsequently to their marriage. If the wife's property was so settled as at some time to go to the husband, and the husband took it, he took it properly in virtue of the settlement. But where there was no settlement as to the wife's subsequently acquired property, then Equity interfered, and said that if the husband wanted the wife's property he must give her a fair share, to be settled upon her. That, however, would be interfered with by this Bill. Why? Another provision of the measure—to which his noble and learned Friend had not called attention—was, that whatever a man might have done by his will in regard to his real estate, his executors or his administrators should have power to mortgage or sell such real estate and pay off his debts. Before that step was taken, however, they would have to go into a Court of Equity to have an account of the personal estate taken. The law at present provided that the executor or administrator should pay all debts out of the estate, and formerly the law was that if he paid a debt before another that had priority, or paid over the residue before all the debts were paid, he rendered himself personally liable for the unpaid debts. The consequence of that state of the law was that executors generally took the wills into Chancery, and every will was made the subject of a Chancery suit. He (Lord St. Leonards), therefore, two or three years ago, caused a clause to be enacted providing that it should be sufficient for an executor or administrator to advertise for all outstanding claims to be sent in by a certain time, just as the Court of Chancery would do, if a bill were filed. Now, if their Lordships looked down the columns of The Times they would see many advertisements from executors requiring creditors to come in and claim payment of their debts or be excluded. Every one of the advertisements was a Chancery suit avoided. But this Bill would indirectly operate to repeal the law as it now stands, and every man's estate would once more be the subject of a Chancery suit. Again, this Bill took away a man's power of testamentary disposition. Under it every man's will might be set aside, and a person to whom he had not given his real estate was to step in and say he would sell or mortgage it and pay off the debts. An enormous amount of the capital belonging to suitors was already in the hands of the Court of Chancery, and the Government had shown a disposition to use the suitors' funds for other purposes than the suitors' benefit, and if the Bill passed he would say to every man in England, "Keep your money out of the hands of that Court." This Bill struck at the true interests, both of attorneys and clients, and in other respects it was most dangerous in principle. He should, therefore, give it his hearty opposition.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that remembering the speech delivered by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack last Session upon the manner in which Acts of Parliament were framed, he was surprised that such a measure as the present should have proceeded from his hand. Its title spoke of "Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration," but the Bill contained provisions relating to various subjects of very great importance, and proposed various alterations of the law which were utterly unconnected with each other. It was quite impossible, so far as he could see, to grasp any one principle by which the Bill was pervaded. Each division would give rise to a separate discussion. It would appear, indeed, as if his noble and learned Friend in drawing it up had stumbled on an Act passed in the reign of George II., entitled—

"An Act to continue several laws for preventing exactions by the occupiers of locks and weirs on the river Thames westward; for ascertaining the rates of water carriage on the said river; for continuing and explaining the several laws for the better regulation of attorneys and solicitors; for regulating the price and assize of bread; for preventing the spreading of distemper amongst horned cattle; also to make further regulations respecting attorney and solicitor, and for further preventing distemper in horned cattle; for more frequently returning writs in the county palatine of Lancaster, for ascertaining the levying of writs of execution, and for allowing Quakers to make affirmation in cases where an oath was required, &c."

That Bill had an advantage over the Bill of his noble and learned Friend, for it fully explained its object. But, various as were the points with which the Bill of his noble and learned Friend dealt, he was afraid it would occasion considerable disappointment after the promises which he had made. He said that, in consequence of the mode in which solicitors were enabled to charge, inducement was held out to them to draw out very long deeds; but the clauses which he had introduced, instead of being confined to conveyancing, empowered all attorneys and solicitors in every case to enter into an agreement with their clients to receive a certain sum of money—so that the necessity of having their bills of costs taxed would thus be obviated. Instead, therefore, of the client being protected by the provisions of the Act of Parliament, which required that an attorney should send in his bill of costs a month before bringing his action upon it, he would, by the clause to which he adverted, get rid altogether of that power of revision, and would be able to enter into an arrangement, and in consequence great over-reaching and oppression might take place. It was even doubtful whether the limited application of the new system to the case of conveyancing only was at all desirable. In reference to the next clause, he might say that he thought there was some inconsistency in the course which his noble and learned Friend had pursued. His noble and learned Friend some time ago compared the family solicitor to the Old Man of the Sea in the story of Sinbad the Sailor, whom it was impossible to shake off. Now, however, his noble and learned Friend proposed to place this Old Man of the Sea more firmly than ever on the shoulders of his clients by enabling him to become a trustee and charge his costs. For these reasons, and also because he regarded it as impossible to discuss the various provisions of the Bill on the second reading, he was of opinion that it should be sent to a Select Committee. He should like before sitting down to state that a speech made some time ago by his noble and learned Friend had given great pain to a considerable body of solicitors, inasmuch as he attributed the ill-success attending his Land Transfer Act in some degree to the circumstance that its objects had been thwarted by the profession to which they belonged. That charge could not, at all events, apply to the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, which consisted of 800 members who had petitioned in favour of the measure. Of course there were instances where solicitors had prevented their clients taking advantage of the Act; but he was perfectly sure, from what he knew of solicitors generally, they were far too honourable a body of men to sacrifice the public good to the promotion of their own selfish interests.

LORD CRANWORTH agreed with the noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) that there was extreme difficulty in discussing such a subject on the second reading of this Bill; but he could not agree with his noble and learned Friend that it ought to be discarded because it contained a great number of subjects.

LORD CHELMSFORD: I did not say it should be discarded.

LORD CRANWORTH: With respect to the mode in which attorneys and solicitors should be remunerated, he partly agreed and partly disagreed with it. As to the proposal that they should be allowed to make bargains instead of charging according to the scale of fees provided by law, he would say that primâ facie all parties to contracts should be allowed to make arrangements between themselves as to the terms of remuneration, because, as a general rule, contracts ought to be free; but, on the other hand, it would not be safe to allow an attorney to go to his client and say, You shall pay me so much—or you shall give such a portion of the estate, as was done in Mrs. Swinfen's case. If such a course should be legalized, he thought the remedy would be worse than the disease. The attorneys and solicitors were a very respectable body, but there were many black sheep in the profession, and it would not be safe to leave them to contract bargains subject to no revision. It is absolutely necessary to fix a scale of remuneration in litigated cases, because the defeated party, who has to pay his adversary's costs, cannot be bound by the contract of his opponent with his attorney. He thought it would be quite safe to say that a party might make a contract for costs in reference to matters of conveyancing; leaving costs in reference to other matters to be left as they were now. As to a solicitor being entitled to charge for professional services in reference to matters with respect to which he was trustee under a will, he doubted whether this should be the case when the solicitor was the only trustee, though it might not be improper in cases where there was more than one trustee. He thought that it was quite right that a solicitor should take security for future costs—and, indeed, he never could discover why this should not be allowed, especially as the costs were liable to taxation. In reference to the clause as to reversions, he must say that he entirely concurred with it. He could not see why a man should not be allowed to enter into the same bargain in reference to the sale of a reversionary interest as of an estate in possession. He could not assent to the 8th section. He thought that the law was quite right that where there had been no provision for the wife before marriage, and property afterwards came to the wife, and was recovered through the Court of Chancery, that the Court should act upon the principle that they would not assist the husband unless he made a fair settlement upon the wife. With regard to all these points, they could be much more conveniently discussed in a Select Committee.

LORD WENSLEYDALE addressed their Lordships, but was quite inaudible.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he had never thought of opposing the suggestion that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. As to the proposal in reference to the remuneration of solicitors, the Law Society approved of it, except in this, that they did not think that the precaution of having an agreement in writing would be necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee, but nothing further was done therein.

MOUNT ST. BERNARD'S REFORMATORY.

QUESTION.

LORD BERNERS in putting the Question to the noble Earl the President of the Council, in reference to the riots that have recently taken place in Mount St. Bernard's Reformatory, said, that the Mount St. Bernard's Monastery was one of the fifty-five which had been instituted in this country since 1829; and emanating from it there arose what was at first called an agricultural college, but which was afterwards licensed by the Secretary of State as a reformatory. Recently some serious disturbances had broken out in this institution, of which his Lordship read some statements from the public journals, and then proceeded to say that for some years the Reformatory had been in a very unsatisfactory state. As far back as 1860 the Inspector of Prisons reported that there were defects in the management of the establishment, arising mainly from the misconduct and inefficiency of several of the "brothers" or officers, but he added that steps had been taken to place these officers on a better footing, and to secure, as far as possible, both a superior class of men and more of them. In 1862 he anticipated an improvement; but in 1863 he said that his anticipations had been frustrated; that the Rev. Canon Ward had received notice to leave at Midsummer; that after him the establishment was placed in the hands of Mr. Martin, the chaplain, who however had been dismissed, and the place was then managed ad interim by Mr. Smith, one of the monks. This person told the boys that if they wanted to smoke—which was against the rules—to do so in private, and where they would not be seen. Accordingly a number of them did smoke in private; and when discovered by a schoolmaster they set upon and assaulted him severely. The Government ought to look to those matters, and see what manner of persons they were intrusting boys to for reformation; more especially as the number of recommittals was greater among Romish than among Protestant boys. The Returns showed that the recommittals of boys discharged from the Protestant Reformatories was 5 per cent, and of those discharged from the Romish Reformatories 8 per cent. The question was whether the Government had any control over this place; and he must say that he believed that they had none except such as was granted by the 17 & 18 Vict., namely, the power of granting licences and of inspection. They had no authority in reference to the appointment or removal of officers however unfit they might be. The main point for consideration was as to what body the reform of criminals should be intrusted; whether it should be intrusted to magistrates, parochial clergy, and gentlemen of such locality, or to Roman Catholic priests, who owed allegiance to another Sovereign than ours. He had that morning received a letter from the chairman of the bench of magistrates at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, stating that Mr. Sydney Turner, the Inspector, had not communicated with the magistrates or the police; and that, therefore, his report must be wholly grounded upon the statements of those connected with the Reformatory. The writer added that he hoped the result would be the total breaking up of the establishment, which had a tendency to demoralize the neighbourhood, and render it in such a state that neither property nor person was safe when these young ruffians chose to have an outbreak, the authorities there having not the least power to put it down without the assistance of the police. In another letter which he had received, it was stated that the force at the Reformatory was a perfect farce when compared with the number of boys; and another writer said he believed that every decent person in the neighbourhood would sign a petition for the removal of the Reformatory. He begged now to ask the noble Earl the question of which he had given notice, Whether the Government had received of late any reports of the discipline and management now in practice at the Romish Reformatory, Mount St. Bernard's, Leicestershire, and of the particulars and causes of the mutiny last week of the 180 inmates, again requiring the assistance of the county police force to maintain order in the institution and to protect the lives and property of the inhabitants of the district; and whether the Government were prepared to withdraw the license from that Reformatory.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was sorry that the noble Lord had been unable to accede to his suggestion that this discussion should be postponed until the papers were laid on the table. It was quite true that a year ago the state of this Reformatory was very discreditable, and his right hon. Friend Sir George Grey had threatened to withdraw the license if an improvement did not take place. Since then there had been an entire change in its management, the Reformatory was now separated from the Monastery, and three or four gentlemen of position had undertaken to look after it. A superintendent was appointed whom Mr. Sydney Turner thought eminently fitted for the task, and Mr. Turner, who had visited the institution constantly during the past year, found a great improvement in the management, and expressed his surprise at the change that had taken place to order and tranquillity; but he stated that a great many of the boys at present confined there had been spoiled by the laxity that had prevailed under the previous management, and expressed his apprehension that these boys would at some time make a sudden outbreak. This apprehension seemed unfortunately to have been well-founded; but the rebellion broke out, he believed, without premeditation, and from what Mr. Turner called "an Irish impulse," on receiving the news of similar outbreaks in other reformatories. Mr. Sydney

Turner was sent down to examine into the matter, and blamed the authorities for want of decision at the first moment when the rebellion broke out; but their excuse was that they were taken completely by surprise. Afterwards they brought in, at their own expense, a certain number of police, and the outbreak was quelled. All the circumstances were set forth in Mr. Turner's Report, which exonerated the authorities from all blame, with this one exception. Under the circumstances, therefore, the Secretary of State determined not to withdraw the certificate, but to prohibit the admission of any new boys for the present. In a Report which was dated only three days ago, Mr. Turner stated that on visiting the institution he found everything in perfect order, and the boys under control. The Secretary of State therefore felt confirmed in his decision not to withdraw the certificate from the Reformatory.

LORD ARUNDELL OF WARDOUR complained that this institution should have been selected for complaint—it ought to be judged by the same standard as was applied to Protestant institutions of the kind. The outbreak at the Castle Howard Reformatory (of which the noble Lord read an account) showed that this Reformatory was not alone in its liability to such rebellions. He was informed that there were 180 boys in the institution and that the present manager had spent £1,200 upon it within the last year. He also begged to deny that this was a monastic institution. The management was a mixed one, partly lay and partly clerical; and the present managers undertook the management when the boys were in a bad state of discipline, and had not recovered from the effects upon their minds of the previous outbreaks.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he could not agree with the noble Lord who had just spoken, that this case had been selected for complaint, for he thought that the management of all reformatories was to be looked at in a perfectly impartial manner by the Government. He had listened to the statement of the outbreak at Castle Howard, but the noble Lord ought to remember that "two negatives make not an affirmative," and therefore an outbreak at Castle Howard did not afford any excuse for an outbreak at Mount St. Bernard's. Looking at what had taken place in the Reformatory, he thought his noble Friend (Lord Berners) was justified in bringing the matter before their Lordships—a matter which was likely to affect the character of similar institutions. There could be no doubt but that these repeated outbreaks caused a great deal of alarm in the neighbourhood of the Reformatory. It was stated that this institution was no longer governed by monks, and he was glad to hear it, for he thought that the management of such a place should not be left in the hands of men who, from previous education and training, could not be well qualified for the task. It would, perhaps, have been better had this discussion been raised after the papers had been produced; but, at the same time, he must state that he had the fullest confidence in Mr. Sydney Turner. He trusted that such amendment would be introduced into this Reformatory as would prevent the recurrence of such scandals as were now complained of.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 78.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee).

Classes 1 to 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 (Appointment of Chief Clerks 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, s. 16).

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "one chief clerk" and insert the words "two clerks." — (Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) observed that the Commissioners reported in favour of a chief clerk, and he could not adopt the recommendation of the hon. Baronet without sufficient reason being assigned.

MR. GEORGE said, it was not satisfactory that an important measure of this kind should be hurried through in the present state of the House—[there were not more than 20 Members present]. He could not help thinking that undue haste was displayed in pressing through these clauses.

MR. O'HAGAN said, he had been waiting there half an hour before the House was made. He might express his surprise that those hon. Members who had given notice of Amendments had not come down to move them. He had no desire to hurry through a single clause without the fullest consideration; but it was too bad that hon. Members who had given notice of their intention to move Amendments should fail to make their appearance to move them, and that the Government should then be accused of desiring to press the clauses through the Committee with undue haste. For his own part he was ready to spend any time in order that the Bill should be properly considered.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought that the Government were hardly in a condition to treat a measure of this importance so peremptorily. He had been in the House up to two o'clock that morning; and when he came down to the Committee on this Bill, hearing that no House had been made, he went to the library to get a book containing the Report of the Committee on this subject, and he lost no time. On his return he found that the House had been made, that the Speaker had left the chair, that the Bill was being hurried through the Committee, inasmuch that eleven clauses had already been passed. His intention had been to propose that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee; but he had lost the opportunity of making the Motion by the precipitancy with which the Committee had been hurried on. It was not for a Ministry that a day or two ago had escaped a Vote of Censure by only half-a-dozen votes, and who last night were signally defeated, to treat the House in this manner. The object of this morning sitting appeared to be not to obtain the opinion of those most competent to give it on this Bill, but to hurry on a Bill, which was not for the interest of the public. The first eleven clauses which had been hurried on contained all that was important. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland knew that he was attending for the purpose of discussing these clauses; the Attorney General for Ireland knew it; and he maintained that it was not a proper course for the Government to force on a Bill without giving Members who were known to be interested in the measure five minutes to pass from one part of the House to another. If the hon. and learned Gentleman thought he could do business in this way, he would find that it was not an insignificant party to which he (Mr. Whiteside) belonged, and that it would enforce due respect for their opinions. When it was first announced that the Committee on this Bill was to be taken at a morning sitting, he (Mr. Whiteside) stated that it would be impossible for him to attend. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland said he could not help that, and that he had been unable to obtain an evening sitting for the consideration of the Bill. All he (Mr. Whiteside) could say was, that when he served under a Ministry that possessed some influence in the House, he was always able to obtain an evening sitting for the discussion of any Bill so important, and he should have believed that he had failed in his duty if he had not represented to the Ministry the necessity of fully and properly considering such a measure. It was neither wise nor prudent to appoint the consideration of a Bill of the nature of the one before the House at a time when those who were interested were unable to attend. His object in endeavouring to procure the reference of a Bill to a Select Committee was the fact that he felt convinced that it would be found that the Bill was not only clumsily framed, but would be the means of inflicting upon the country a great and unnecessary expense. No one would venture to say that the Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls concurred in this Bill; on the contrary, the head of the Court was of opinion that all that this Bill proposed should be done by general orders. He found no instance of a Bill of this kind being introduced without the consent of the head of the Court. His silence showed that he did not approve of the Bill. He (Mr. Whiteside) wished to see this Bill referred to a Select Committee, because a Committee of the ablest men of the House had considered the appointment of Vice Chancellors, one for the Court of Chancery, one for the Lands Estates Court, and they said the evidence convinced them that the business was better and more cheaply done by the Masters than it could be by a Vice Chancellor, and they refused to appoint the Vice Chancellor. There was no demand among the public for a measure of that description. No petition had been presented in its favour from the Bar, or the body of solicitors, or the suitors. He wanted to examine witnesses for the purpose of throwing light on the merits of the case, and a Select Committee would enable him to accomplish that object. It would be a complete delusion to suppose that the causes in Ireland with which that Bill would deal were of anything like the magnitude and complexity of the corresponding causes in this country. He wished to know how the smaller causes were to be disposed of, if the measure were passed. Were causes which involved sums of only from £200 to £500 to be brought before the Court of Chancery? It should be remembered that five-sixths of the business of the Masters, whom the Bill would abolish, were performed by the junior counsel, and a comparatively trifling expense was thus incurred. The work of the Masters, too, was discharged in the most satisfactory manner. The solicitors in Ireland, who had the conduct of these suits, were paid very moderately; while it was only natural to suppose that if the business was to be removed to a higher Court, higher prices would be demanded for its management. He believed, too, that one Vice Chancellor would be unable to perform all the work which was at present done by four Masters. The expense, he was assured, would be increased one-third. By this Bill they perpetuated the old system of taking evidence by an Examiner, only they made it seven times worse than it was formerly. Were they to perpetuate the system which was so detrimental in the old Ecclesiastical Court? Why, in the case before the House of Lords now, in Scotland nine months were consumed in taking the written evidence; but it was all taken in Ireland and counsel heard in six days; and it was this system of written evidence, which was an obstruction of justice, which this Bill proposed they should return to! Then it proposed to return to the system of demurrers—a system which had worked most unsatisfactory for suitors. Then on the Chief Clerk question the principle of this Bill was directly opposed to that affirmed by the House in the Landed Estates Bill. Take a case of an estate of £100,000 in court, the estate was gone, and the claimants upon it sent in their claims. Was the Chief Clerk as competent a person to decide them as the gentleman who at present performed that duty? He thought not; and this was a question he wished to submit to a Select Committee. The course they should adopt was that of the Landed Estates Court. It was in comparison with that proposed in this Bill perfect. The Court had done an immense amount of business; its accounts were taken satisfactorily by the Judges at one quarter of the expense and in a quarter of the time that it would take the Chief Clerk. Certainly these Judges were more competent to decide these points than a Chief Clerk. There was at present no court in which the proposed Vice Chancellor could sit, and the fact was that a further expenditure would have to be incurred in the erection of an edifice for that purpose. He would suggest to the Government that if they wished to consult economy in this matter, that the Court of Chancery in Ireland, in addition to the Lord Chancellor, Justice of Appeal, and Master of the Rolls, should consist of two Judges, one to be selected from the Judges of the Landed Estates Court and the other from the present Masters in Chancery, and that no Chief Clerks or other officers with judicial functions should be attached to the Judges, but that the latter should be responsible for the conduct of the entire business in their respective courts. He had intended to move that an Instruction to that effect should be sent to the Select Committee together with the Bill, but he had been informed by the Speaker that such a course could not be adopted. There were three Judges in the Landed Estates Court, and two were ample for the business transacted in that Court, so that if the Attorney General for Ireland were intent upon making a Vice Chancellor, and were at the same time disposed to practise economy, he could effect his object much more cheaply than was contemplated by the Bill before the House—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose to order. There was a distinct Motion before the House; but the hon. and learned Gentleman, instead of speaking upon that Motion, was going into the details of the different clauses of the Bill. He apprehended that the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to speak upon the Motion, and not to pursue the extraordinary course which he was taking.

MR. WHITESIDE contended that he was not going through the Bill clause by clause, but simply showing reasons why the Chairman should report Progress, with a view to his moving in the whole House that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. MASSEY said, he understood that the hon. and learned Gentleman would conclude by a Motion to report Progress, with a view to an ulterior proceeding, and he was showing reasons why it was desirable that he should take this ulterior proceeding, and that to enable him to do so the House should resume.

MR. WHITESIDE: That was precisely so. He proceeded to point out that there were numerous claims for compensation. Then as to the expense of the Bill—what would it be? There was a building clause, under which offices were to be erected; but before they had any ground for these offices to be built on, the staff was to be appointed and paid, whilst the present officers were doing the work; in fact, the measure could not come into operation for two years. He believed the time at which the Bill was introduced was inappropriate, and it would be well to withdraw it, and have some general orders drawn up and submitted to the Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls for their sanction. Another point he wished to call attention to was this, that Ireland was not in a condition to bear increased taxation, which the Bill would impose. It was idle to expect that a Bill of that magnitude could be passed during the present Session. [The hon. and learned Member, whose address had been listened to throughout with great impatience, and who consequently was very imperfectly followed, concluded by moving, That the Chairman do leave the Chair.]

MR. VANCE seconded the Motion. He had objected from the beginning to the Bill being appointed for a morning sitting, and the result of that day's proceedings proved the correctness of his opinion. When he came into the House there was one Member on the Opposition Benches, and only six on the other side of the House. Many Irish Members were engaged on an important Committee and were unable to attend, and others also were unavoidably absent. It was most undesirable that a Bill of such importance should be considered in so thin a House. His constituents in Dublin strongly disapproved of the Bill, and did not wish to see the present cheap and efficient tribunals abolished. Substantial justice was obtained in the existing courts at a very small cost, and if the present measure were passed, they would necessarily have with the English system the English scale of costs. The most important clauses of the Bill had been passed accidentally and without any discussion, and he hoped that under these circumstances the Government would consent to refer the measure to a Select Committee.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do leave the Chair."—(Mr. Whiteside.)

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, he had listened to the extraordinary performance of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin with very considerable amazement. He had never doubted his hon. and learned Friend's powers; but here the hon. and learned Gentleman had occupied—he would with all due respect say abused—the patience of the Committee for two hours and a half with a speech which had about as much to do with the Motion as with the affairs of Kamschatka or the Great Mogul. Even the authority of the Chairman could not restrain his eloquence; for although he had given notice of a Motion which the Chairman told him he could not move, he had continued to speak upon it for an hour. The motive for his hon. and learned Friend's proceeding was apparent, and the proceeding was worthy of the motive; but he would put it to his hon. and learned Friend, whether such a course was worthy of his hon. and learned Friend's position? He, therefore, would not follow his hon. and learned Friend into the details upon which he had entered; but there were assertions—marvellous assertions, audacious assertions—in the address of his hon. and learned Friend which he could not allow to pass unnoticed. With regard to his position in reference to this Bill, it was a most simple one; he was the mere instrument in the matter. The Commission, upon whose Report the Bill was founded, was one whose ability and integrity were unquestionable; and after two years' labour they unanimously recommended an adoption of a certain course to assimilate the practice of Ireland to that of England where it was desirable, and it became his duty to introduce this Bill to the House carrying out the recommendations of the Commission. There was not a Member of the Irish bar of opposition who was not in favour of it. He brought forward the measure and gave ample time for its consideration; on its introduction and the second reading it was discussed, and he found it impossible to pass it except at a morning sitting, which was fixed to-day. He came down at twelve o'clock for the Bill, waited for a long half hour before the House was made; and those who were outside knew whose fault it was that it was not made. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield) had an Amendment on the paper, and was sitting in the House until the Speaker was moved out of the Chair for the purpose of going into Committee; but the hon. Member left the House and did not move his Amendment. Was he, then, to be told he had taken advantage of the hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House? When the hon. Member for Mallow left the House, in rushed the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. White-side) in the fine frenzy that so well became him, and was so usual with him, and made a charge against him (Mr. O'Hagan). The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he intended to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee; but that question was not yet before the House, and he (Mr. O'Hagan) had only to say that he brought in this Bill on his own responsibility. He believed it was for the public interest, and that it should be carried. If it were not carried it would not be his fault, and he left the responsibility on those who chose to accept it.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was not the duty of the Opposition to make a House, keep a House, and cheer the Minister. The attention of that hon. and learned Gentleman had been drawn to the fact that it was not desirable that this Bill should come on at a morning sitting, and it was proved that this was so by the fact that the Government was unable for so long a time to make a House, and that the hon. Gentlemen most competent to express an opinion on this Bill were absent. He did not blame the hon. and learned Gentleman for pressing on his Bill, but he thought the Irish Members had a right to claim an evening sitting for the discussion of a Bill of this importance to them. He thought much more progress could have been made in the Bill had the opinions and views of Irish Members been consulted.

MR. BUTT pointed out that several important measures had been disposed of at morning sittings. Three years ago he moved for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the difference between the English and Irish practice. Finding it impossible to succeed in this House, it was with his consent taken out of his hands and carried by a noble Marquess in the other House. That Commission was appointed, and this Bill was founded on the Report of that Commission. Every person in the courts of justice in Ireland who had been examined had given their evidence in favour of the assimilation of the practice in England and Ireland.

Question put, "That the Chairman do leave the Chair."

[No Report.]

[BILL 78.]—THE DIVISION.

The House having resumed at Six o'clock—

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN: Sir, I desire to mention to Mr. Speaker a question which has arisen in my own case at the close of the morning sitting of the House. A division took place at four o'clock, while the House was in Committee upon the Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill, on the Question whether the Chairman should leave the Chair. I had intended to vote with the "Noes." At the time of taking the division, the Attorney General was named one of the Tellers, and an hon. Gentleman was named another of the Tellers who was not then in the House. I offered to act as Teller in his place, and accordingly remained here while the House was cleared in order to act as Teller for the "Noes." Just, however, as the House was clear, the hon. Member for Northampton consented to act as Teller, and I therefore retired — going however, by mistake, into the lobby of the "Ayes" instead of that of the "Noes." When I got into the lobby I instantly discovered my mistake; but the hon. Member for Horsham told me that, being in the lobby, I should be obliged to vote with the "Ayes." Accordingly I did so vote. But the moment I returned into the House, and before the voting paper was placed in the hands of the Chairman, I informed Mr. Massey of the mistake I had made. I desire to mention this to you, and I respectfully submit that my vote ought to be counted with the "Noes," and not with the "Ayes."

MR. SPEAKER: One of the difficulties of this case arises from the circumstance that no Report has been made from the Committee to the House. The decision in the Committee was final and conclusive as to the proceedings of the Committee, and the Committee, in consequence of the vote, makes no Report to the House. The hon. Member, as an individual, asks a question of me, which, perhaps, would have been more properly addressed to the Chairman of the Committee, whose decision in Committee is final. The Chairman of the Committee did, in fact, decide the Question by taking the numbers as they were handed to him and accepting that decision, and it is that decision which prevents any Report being made to the House. But if it be the pleasure of the House to be reminded of what has taken place on former occasions, I do not think that the hon. Member could have had any relief under the circumstances of the case. There are several precedents—some of a recent date. In a case in 1856 one of the Tellers for the "Noes" stated that Mr. Wykeham Martin, who was in the lobby with the "Noes," had refused to vote. He had gone into the lobby by mistake. He was informed that, having heard the Question put and being in the lobby with the "Noes," he must be counted with those in that lobby. There is another case which I think is stronger. On the 8th of May, 1860, notice was taken that a Member had been in the lobby with the "Noes," but, having passed the division clerks, had avoided being counted. He stated that he had gone into that lobby by mistake; but, being in the lobby, and having heard the Question put, the Speaker directed his vote to be added to the "Noes." In that case the misapprehension was discovered as early as it was by the hon. Baronet in the present instance. In this case it is not open to me to give any decision. There has been no Report to the House. But what I have stated has been the ruling of the House in similar cases; and I think that the hon. Member, having heard the Question put, and having gone into the lobby with the "Noes," was rightly counted with the "Noes."

THE INCOME TAX COMMISSIONERS AT BLYTHING.—QUESTION.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is under the direction or with the sanction of the Government, or of the Board of Inland Revenue, that the Income Tax Commissioners for the district of Blything, in the county of Suffolk, required the farmers within that district appealing under the Act 14 Vict. c. 12, s. 3, with a view to relief against the assessment under Schedule B of the Income Tax Act, to make up their balance-sheets from April to April, instead of from Michaelmas to Michaelmas, as heretofore done under the express authority of the Board of Inland Revenue?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought that his hon. and learned Friend had not been quite accurately informed as to the circumstances of this case with reference to the intervention of the Government. He appeared to suppose that for a certain period the Commissioners referred to had received the balance-sheets of farmers made up from Michaelmas to Michaelmas, under the express authority of the Board of Inland Revenue. The law required that the accounts should be made up from April to April, and the Board of Inland Revenue had no power to alter or to sanction departures from that system. The administration, as the hon. and learned Gentleman knew, was in the hands of district Commissioners, and upon the point being raised, the Board of Inland Revenue directed their surveyors not to interfere or to make any objection to the proceedings of the Commissioners, limiting their intervention to that single direction. In the case of certain farmers the local Commissioners had accepted accounts made up from Michaelmas to Michaelmas as a basis of account for purposes of appeal; but a similar appeal having been made subsequently, the Commissioners felt it their duty to adhere to the letter of the law, and accordingly required the farmer to produce his accounts made up from April to April. He was quite sensible of the inconvenience which might arise practically from this decision of the Commissioners, but they had acted upon their own jurisdiction; and as the Board of Inland Revenue had not been disposed to interfere in order to enforce compliance with the law, they clearly would not be justified in doing so now when the Commissioners saw fit to adhere to the literal construction of the statute.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would beg to ask, Whether there would be any objection to produce Copies of the Correspondence with the Board of Inland Revenue on this subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: None whatever.

NAVY—COURT MARTIAL AT JAMAICA. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that three young Naval Officers have been tried by Court Martial at Jamaica for insubordination, and have been sentenced, in addition to other punishment, to a long imprisonment in the common gaol at Kingston, Jamaica; and whether the Admiralty have confirmed that portion of the sentence?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, the Court Martial had awarded the punishment referred to in the Question of the hon. and gallant Member; but the Officer commanding in chief on the station had ordered those young Officers to be sent home to be dealt with by the Home authorities.

THE ASHANTEE WAR. QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it has been taken into consideration that a Sailing Ship leaving Cape Coast six weeks or two months hence, and bound to the West Indies, will be obliged to adopt the "middle passage;" and, in that event, whether the effects of a protracted voyage in such a climate on Officers and Men already debilitated may not be attended by disastrous effects?

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, that before the noble Lord answered the Question of the hon. Baronet, he desired to put another Question to him on the same subject, of which he had given him private notice. He wished to ask the noble Lord, What number of Officers and Men now upon the Gold Coast Station the Admiralty have been requested to provide passages for? and to call the noble Lord's attention to the statement made by him on that subject on Friday last. ["Order!"] He would move the adjournment of the House to put himself in order. It might be in the recollection of the House, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Wakefield, in the debate on the Ashantee War, called attention to a certain document, which had been laid on the table from the War Department. The Secretary to the Admiralty replying to the hon. and gallant Member's remarks on that document—

MR. SPEAKER: I must direct the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that moving the adjournment of the House will not give him an opportunity of referring to past debates.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY: Then I will simply put my Question.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, the middle passage to which the hon. Baronet (Sir James Elphinstone) has referred is, as he stated, necessarily taken by vessels going from that portion of the coast of Africa to the West Indies. The transport will be towed out, as I stated yesterday, into the offing, and will probably leave with a south-east trade; by making a westerly course she will probably carry the south-east trade for a day or two, and then get into the north-east trade, thus making the passage to the West Indies nearly as quick as a steamer. Anybody who knows that part of the world knows that in summer time one can run from the south-eastern into the north-eastern trade with very little delay; and I apprehend that the troops on board that ship will be just as comfortable as they would be in a steamer. I do not know exactly at what the Question of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. C. P. Berkeley) is pointed, but I shall be very happy to give him the number of troops upon which the original requisition was founded, and likewise the subsequent arrangement with the military authorities. The first body of troops to be taken away consisted of 480 men, and a certain number of women and children, and were to go from Cape Coast Castle to the West Indies. Subsequently the War Office determined to send about six officers and 200 men from Cape Coast Castle to Lagos, where they will relieve about a similar number, who are to be taken to Sierra Leone.

AFFAIRS OF THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, To lay upon the table of the House the entire Despatch from Sir Augustus Paget to Earl Russell, of August 10th, in which it is asserted that Count Sponneck was favourable to the neutralization of the Ionian Islands, and which states that "Count Sponneck appears to have no objection to the razing of the fortifications?"

MR. LAYARD said, he must call the attention of his hon. Friend to the fact that Count Sponneck was not, as represented, in favour of the neutralization of the Ionian Islands, but merely stated that he did not see why the principle should not be extended. It would be detrimental to the public service to produce the entire despatch.

REFORM IN THE ROYAL COURT OF JERSEY.—QUESTION.

MR. PAULL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will consent, on the part of the Government, to the further progress, during the present Session, of a Bill entitled "A Bill to amend the Constitution, Practice, and Procedure of the Court of the Island of Jersey?"

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, he adhered to the opinion which he had formerly expressed, that it was very desirable that reforms in the Royal Court of Jersey, recommended by the Commissioners, should be carried into effect by the Estates rather than by any intervention of Parliament. He would state the intentions of the Government on this subject when the Bill referred to came on for discussion.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES IN THE ROYAL NAVY.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to advise the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the pay and allowances of Officers of the Royal Navy?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, it had not been usual to appoint a

Lord Clarence Paget

Royal Commission to inquire into the pay and allowances of the Navy as distinguished from other branches of Her Majesty's Service, and he was not aware of any intention to establish a novel precedent.

AUSTRALIAN POSTAGE.

QUESTION.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the rates of Postage on Letters between this Country and Australia has recently been doubled; and if so, whether, considering that our Australian Colonies contribute one moiety of the Postal Subsidy required for this service, they have been consulted as to this increase, or have in any way expressed their opinion respecting it?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the revenue derived from letters sent to Australia was not nearly sufficient to pay our moiety for transmitting that correspondence. It had consequently been decided from the 1st of next month to raise the charge on letters to Australia from 6d. to 1s., but the same regulation provided that the postage on letters sent by private ships should be reduced to 4d., with a view of meeting the case of poorer correspondents to whom economy was a greater object than expedition. Our postal arrangements with Australia were based on a Treasury Minute of 1855, and it did not, as was supposed, form any part of that arrangement that the rates of postage should not be raised by either party without mutual consent. On the contrary, the Minute contained the following passage:—

"One of the advantages of the plan we have adopted will be that it will leave the House and the Colonial Government free to regulate the rates of postage in any way they may think fit."

Due notice of the alteration has been given to the Australian Colonies.

THE BALLOT.—RESOLUTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, that in asking the House to agree to the Resolution he rose to propose, he had taken a different course from that which he usually followed, because it appeared to him that the approach of a General Election gave him an opportunity of making some remarks which were certainly called for, and which he trusted hon. Gentlemen would take to their hearts. They had heard of Earl Russell climbing an exceedingly high mountain, and finding on the top of that mountain an inscription which advised him to "rest and be thankful." No doubt he did rest, and, no doubt, he was thankful; but why the noble Earl should insist upon all Parliamentary reformers also resting he could not understand. He could understand the noble Earl asking them to be thankful, and, indeed, he thought the reformers of England were very thankful to the noble Earl for his brilliant exertions in the cause of reform. When, however, the noble Earl asked the reformers in that House to rest, it appeared to him to savour of absurdity. Were there no longer any abuses to redress? Were there no evils to be got rid of? Had they become so perfect and so pure that no reform of the political system was required? Were they arrived at the Ultima Thule of reformation? Had England become Utopia? Had they nothing left to do but to enjoy themselves and be happy? An examination of the existing state of things would prove diametrically the contrary. Was there any Act of Parliament at that moment which interfered with intimidation, put down bribery, or prevented other corrupt practices? He would be a bold Member of Parliament who would say that any such Act existed. An Act, it was true, existed which had superseded others having a like object, and which was called the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act. But did that Act put down any of these evils? Why, it was laughed at from one end of the country to the other by every attorney's clerk. The House would permit him to go back for a moment to the formation of the Committee which produced the Report that was laid hold of by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary and converted by him into an Act of Parliament. That was shortly after an election of more than ordinary enormity which took place during the Earl of Aberdeen's Administration. Corrupt practices so largely prevailed at that election that the Earl of Aberdeen, from whom no one had a right to expect much reform, declared that no one could be enamoured of our electoral position. Thereupon a Committee was formed. But how was it formed? Almost all the legal talent of the House was engaged upon it. There were the Attorney General and the Solicitor General, ex-Attorney Generals and ex-Solicitor Generals, and hon. Gentlemen from both sides of the House learned in the law, were likewise joined in that focus of law. After a short time that Committee, which was a kind of mountain of law, did as other mountains did—fell into labour and produced a mouse, a most insignificant little vermin, as its offspring. The Home Secretary framed a law upon that Report, and said here is a law that will cure all your evils—there is now an end to all further complaints. There were certain provisions in the Bill that enlisted the sympathies of a great number of Members. It did away with processions, ribands, bands, and other sources of expense which fell upon candidates. Accordingly, Members swallowed the rest of the Bill, which from end to end was perfectly inadequate, if not mischievous, because it guarded candidates at the poll, and fixed all the responsibility and all the punishment upon the electors. When the Bill became law it was reviewed in The Times by a man now no more, but who knew more about elections than probably any other man in England. He referred to the late Mr. Coppock. He wrote an analysis of the Bill, which The Times endorsed, saying it was evident that it was a "pompous profession meant to be inoperative." He would call the attention of the House, not to Mr. Coppock's analysis, but to the article in The Times. The writer showed that the great object of the Bill appeared to be not to unseat candidates, because they were carefully protected against danger, and unless they were personally in fault they might laugh at all the attempts made to turn them out. The candidate was to name certain persons as his agents, and if they committed bribery his seat was lost, but the subordinate agents, who were not appointed, might buy votes by the dozen without affecting the seat, although they would themselves be liable to proceedings. As to intimidation, if a man discharged his tenant or his servant, or ceased to deal with his tradesmen on account of his vote, it would be an unconstitutional act, but although the fact might be undoubted, there might be no means of proving it, and the consequence was that the clause would be totally inoperative. The late Sir Robert Peel in the case of the late Duke of Newcastle, defended his Grace, who had turned out some seventy of his tenants, on the plea that he considered he had a right to do as he liked with his own. Sir Robert Peel did not defend the propriety of the action, yet he said it was impossible to touch it by law, and if they attempted to do so, they would plunge into a course of legislation which was anything but desirable. That was the opinion of Sir Robert Peel. It was likewise the opinion of Lord Macaulay, who, in a speech at Edinburgh, stated that, as for making any law to prevent a man from turning out one of his tenants at will, or discharging one of his tradesmen, it was an absolute absurdity. Well, that kind of legislation had been resorted to in that Parliament, and, of course, the Act became inoperative. As they were approaching the period of a General Election, he trusted the House would permit him to point out what had been done, could be done, and would be done again under the Act. Taking, for example, some large commercial or manufacturing town, he would describe a few of the events which occurred at the time of a contested election. The first thing that was done by the partizans of a candidate was to secure certain persons called "Men from the Moon," that was, persons known to nobody—who came, stayed a short time, and disappeared. Now, a "Man from the Moon" descended upon one of those boroughs, took up his position at some hotel, and next morning went to some licensed victualler and says, "On this day week I shall require forty breakfasts." The "Man from the Moon" was generally accompanied by some mysterious person, perfectly well known to the licensed victualler, but who said nothing. The licensed victualler said, "My price is so and so," to which the "Man from the Moon" replied, "Oh, certainly." He then paid visits to other licensed victuallers, until he had ordered breakfasts to the amount of £400 or £500, and then retired from the busy scene. There might be twenty, thirty, or forty voters at one of the large shipyards or factories of the boroughs, and on the morning of the polling these voters went to breakfast, then to the poll; and after that, hung about, forming part of that crowd which applauded or expressed disapprobation, or assisted in bringing up electors to the poll. That must be hungry work, and about the middle of the day the men, by sixes and sevens, proceeded to certain houses, not completely finished, and there get beef, beer, and spirits, which had been conveyed there over night. At whose expense? Why, everybody knew at the expense of the candidate; but who was to prove it? At the end of the week the men went to receive their wages, but not having been at work on the day of polling, they should not get wages for that day, but they got paid full wages for it after all. Those were facts which could be easily proved. There, then, was treating in the first place which was declared illegal, and there was bribery in the next, for if paying a man who did not work a day's wages was not bribery, what was? How could the only Act which they had to stop bribery interfere with such a case as he had mentioned? The breakfasts were not paid for by the "Man from the Moon," but when the time within which petitions could be presented had passed, another descended and paid the Bills. He had said nothing about the bribery which took place between two and four o'clock, when £5 notes changed hands, and when persons who never had a pound in their possession before paid away large sums in corrupting others. Although these men, when found out, were liable to be punished, the candidate remained untouched. Now, could it be supposed that any of these bribers had such a strong affection for their candidate that they would borrow money to secure his election? If they did not receive it from the candidate in some way or other, from whom did they receive it? He had shown that corruption and malversation flourished malgré the Act of Parliament. He would next suppose the Bill in operation, and applied to the case of such a borough as he had described. In the first place no "Man from the Moon" would be needed, no breakfasts required, otherwise a man might have his opponent's voters devouring his tea and toast. For the same reason no dinners would be placed in empty refreshment houses, and what would become of the holiday when no wage would be paid for it, for a man would not be inclined to give away money, which might go into the pockets of his opponent's supporters? He had shown fair reasons for believing that the ballot would supply the deficiency in our present law, and all he asked was that it should get a fair trial. He knew he should be met by the bare contradiction, "Oh! but the ballot won't do this;" but to that he replied that assertion is no argument. He would show that the ballot had done that. Let them turn to the Australian colonies, and they would find that a perfect reformation had been wrought. When the ballot was first proposed there, it was met by arguments a vast deal more able than had been used against it here, but it was supported by that irresistible logic of which Mr. Grote was the author. And what was the result of this adoption? The original opponents of the Ballot in Australia were now its warmest supporters, and it was remarkable that the only class of persons who were opposed to it there were the Roman Catholic priests. Now, in this country and in Ireland the priests were to a man in favour of the Ballot, and it had been stated over and over again by the Irish landlords, that if they got the Ballot it would not be fair play because the vote would be concealed from them, but would be known to the priests. A gentleman in private conversation had said to him, "Don't tell me you can invent any box of which the priest cannot get to the bottom." He had produced an argument from Australia to show that that was not the case. He had on a former occasion shown that they had witnessed the break-down of the greatest democratic republic in the world, and various elements appeared in that chaos, but the Ballot in that wreck of institutions held its own, and appeared destined to restore order. What said a correspondent of The Times? That "if the forms of American liberty last as long as Mr. Lincoln's time of office, the agency of the ballot-box will consign that unlucky functionary to private life, and elect some other president in his stead." Probably so; but how would it be if there were open voting in America? Need he ask any man of common sense what chance any man would have against Abraham Lincoln and his hordes of mercenary cut-throats? Well, were they really become so virtuous—were the constituencies become so pure that the Reformers in that House might rest and be thankful? He thought not. He would ask the House to allow him to compare the account of our political virtue as given by old Andrew Marvell in 1678, and the account given by Bishop Burnett in the History of his Own Times; and then he would like to conclude with a comparison with the political virtue which they then possessed as pictured by a gentleman well known to that House—Mr. Erskine May. Andrew Marvell said—

"It was not to be expressed the debauchery and lewdness which upon the occasion of elections are now grown habitual throughout the nation, so that the vice and the expense are risen to such a prodigious height that few sober men can endure to stand to be chosen upon such conditions."

What said Bishop Burnett? He said that all laws which could be made would prove ineffectual, because to cure so great an evil till there came a change and reformation in the morals of the people would be impossible; and till the candidates became men of other temper and other principles than then appeared. Let them now see what happened in their own days, according to Mr. Erskine May. It appeared that at Canterbury 155 electors were bribed at one election, and 79 at another. At Barnstaple there were 255 electors bribed, and at Cambridge 111. At one place the sum of £26,000 had been spent in three elections. In 1858 a Commission reported that 183 freemen of Galway received bribes. In 1860 there were strange disclosures affecting the city of Gloucester. This place had long been familiar with corruption. Indeed, in 1816, a single candidate spent £16,000. It appeared that at the last election in 1859, no less than 250 electors were bribed, and 81 persons were guilty of corrupt practices. Up to that time the places which had been distinguished by such malpractices returned members to Parliament prior to the Reform Bill, but in 1860, a perplexing disclosure was made that bribery had also extensively prevailed in the populous and thriving borough of Wakefield, where 86 electors were bribed; and such was the zeal of the canvassers that no less than 98 persons were concerned in bribing the corrupted. He would ask the House whether, when such was the case, they ought to "rest and be thankful." The time was approaching when the great electoral Saturnalia would be present, and then intimidation would produce as ever its reign of terror, bribery would corrupt, and inebriety would demoralize. That state of things would exhibit itself in a form hardly ever witnessed before on account of the great struggle which would take place between the two great political parties. On that occasion there would be seen all those horrors which he had been in the habit of describing, and the screw would be turned on the country by hosts of attorneys, who well knew how to put the strain on the point which told upon the condition of the elector. Surely, then, it was not too much to ask, seeing that there was no existing remedy for that state of things (for the present Act had proved a dead failure), that the votes should be taken in a manner which had proved successful elsewhere. Consequently, he thought that he was entitled to move the following Resolution:—

"That, as a General Election is impending, and it is notorious that our electoral system is defective and corrupt in practice, and as we have no law which can put down the intimidation of voters nor prevent bribery, it is therefore expedient that a fair trial shall be given to the vote by Ballot."

Mr. LOCKE said, he rose to second the Motion. He would not detain the House long as he did not presume to think for a moment that the Motion would be carried, but he thought thanks were due to the hon. Member for bringing the subject before the House, because at no distant period Gentlemen opposite would have an opportunity of experiencing those evils which his hon. Friend had so ably described. He thought the thanks of the House were due to his hon. Friend for having afforded to each of them an opportunity of ascertaining whether or not they had retrograded on the question of the Ballot. It was just as well, having reference to the day which was not far distant, that they should register their opinions upon such a question for the consideration of the British public. The usual objection to the Ballot was, that it could not be carried out; but he would call attention to what took place on a former occasion. On a former occasion when there was a long debate on the question, an hon. Gentleman who had since become a Member of the Government—he meant the hon. Member for Pontefract—speaking for the first time in the House, described the working of the Ballot in Melbourne so as to convince many Gentlemen that if the system were adopted here it would be a great improvement on the present state of things. The hon. Member removed one of the chief objections urged against the Ballot by showing that at Melbourne a scrutiny could take place in as effective a manner as in any Committee-room of the House of Commons. An argument which was much in favour with the noble Lord at the head of the Government was that the Ballot was un-English; but if its tendency were to prevent intimidation, bribery, drunkenness, and other evils, then every man who wished well to his country ought to vote for the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, especially as a General Election was understood to be impending.

Motion made and Question proposed,

"That, as a General Election is impending, and it is notorious that our Electoral system is defective and corrupt in practice, and as we have no Law which can put down the intimidation of Voters, nor prevent bribery, it is therefore expedient that a fair trial should be given to the Vote by Ballot."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I assure the House that there are many circumstances and (pointing to the clock) a warning-hand which bid me to be brief;

but I am anxious to state, in as concise a form as I can, the reasons why I shall, as usual, oppose the Motion of my hon. Friend. I can only say to my hon. Friend personally that I hope the result will not make him feel so comfortable in his present position [Mr. Berkeley was seated on the Opposition Bench] as to induce him to make it permanent. I should be exceedingly sorry to see him continue where he is now. Nothing can be more honourable to any man than steadily adhering to the cause or party which he has adopted; and the more the cause or the party is going down in public opinion, the more honourable is the devotion of its supporters; and I think my hon. Friend will himself confess that the plan advocated in his Motion is not so strong in popular sympathy as it has been formerly. I object to the Motion because it is founded on an erroneous assumption. The hon. Member deals with the right of voting as if it were a personal right, which an individual was entitled to exercise free from any responsibility, whereas I contend that the vote is a trust to be exercised on behalf of the community at large. Even if the franchise were ever so extended—even if we had a manhood franchise, if every man arrived at the age of discretion were entitled to vote, it would be only a trust, because there would still be a large portion of the community, women and minors, affected by the laws, by taxation, and so on, whose interests would be committed to those who had votes. Indeed, our legislation is based on the understanding that a vote is a trust, and not a right. If a vote were a purely personal right, would not a voter be entitled to ask on what principle of justice you should punish him for exercising it in the manner which he thinks most for his own individual advantage? But you attach a penalty to the man who employs that right of voting in a way at variance, as you deem, with the public interest, for bribery or any other such consideration. I say, then, that a vote is a trust, and I maintain that every political trust ought to be exercised subject to the responsibility of public opinion. The whole political framework of civilized nations rests on the principle of trust. The interests of the community are in various degrees, more or less important, committed to a selected few who are charged with duties, in regard to particular things, on behalf of the people at large; and their action in fulfilling that trust ought to be subject to responsibility towards those on whose account they exercise it. But I contend that the Ballot as proposed is intended to withdraw the voter from that responsibility which the public exercise of the trust confided to him would impose, and in that respect I think it would be a political evil. We have been told about the system in other countries—in America, for instance. But in America, as everybody knows, ballot voting is not secret. It is ticket voting. A man votes for a great number of officers at a time, and he sticks his ticket in his hat, and is proud of the party and the cause he espouses; he does not think of concealing the members, judges, governor, or other officers appointed by public election in the United States for whom he gives his voice. The Ballot, then, I hold, is founded on a mistake in principle, and is at variance with the fundamental assumption on which all our political institutions are based. Well, would it be effectual for the purpose for which it is proposed? I deny that. In this country, I maintain, that a man is proud of his party. He may be thought right or wrong by his neighbours, but I do not believe that when he has been enlisted under the banner of one candidate or the other he is not proud of the side he has taken. So far from wishing to conceal his vote, or sneaking with it to the ballot box, he tells all his friends what he is going to do, and is rather anxious than otherwise that the whole community to which he belongs should know it. If you shrink from a public investigation of the voting, it follows that you must also do away with canvassing committees. You must forbid canvassing. You must make it penal for a man to tell beforehand how he is going to vote. Generally every man has a political bias—a partiality for one party or the other—and it is next to impossible that a majority of electors should vote even by Ballot without their votes being known. Would the Ballot assist those who may desire to conceal their votes? The hon. Member spoke of the protection it would give to the man who was now afraid if he did not vote in a certain way that his landlord would take away his farm, or a customer withdraw his patronage. But would it do so? In the first place the landlord or customer who intended to punish his tenant or tradesman for giving a vote against his wishes would canvass him beforehand, would apply for a promise, and if it were refused would know what that implied, and would deal with the voter accordingly. Perhaps the landlord or customer might wait until the election was over, and then ask the man how he voted. If the elector did not choose to tell an untruth (which would, of course, be demoralizing), he must either give an evasive answer, the meaning of which would be understood, or confess that he had voted against the wishes of his patron. Consequently, the voter would be dealt with in such a case just the same as if he had given his vote openly and without reserve; and as far as protecting the tenant or tradesman from the landlord or customer is concerned, the Ballot would be totally ineffectual. With regard to treating, the hon. Member has told us how an election is conducted, how the public-houses are thrown open, and how men belonging to one party go to the houses taken by their candidate. This would not be prevented by the Ballot. Now, the Ballot would not prevent bribery, because an agent might go to an elector and say, "Here is £5 or £10. I trust to your honour; you shall have this money if you will promise to vote for so and so, but not otherwise." The elector, if without any particular predilection in another direction, would probably be tempted to take the money and give the promise, which, I dare say, he would keep faithfully. I have that opinion of the electors of this country that I believe they generally would keep their promise, at whatever time it might have been exacted. Then as to the public-houses, would it not be very easy for the Man in the Moon, described by the hon. Gentleman, and his friends to make arrangements that the public-houses should be accessible only to those who carried signs or emblems by which it would be known that they were supporters of a particular candidate? I say, then, that the Ballot is erroneous in principle, and would be ineffectual in practice. Objection has been taken to my having applied to the Ballot the epithet un-English. I may vary the expression, and say it is adverse to and inconsistent with the habits and feelings of Englishmen, who are usually proud of their political opinions, anxious to manifest to friends and neighbours what those political opinions are, and to act in accordance with them, and therefore I say that a system of secrecy is at variance with the habits, opinions, and practice of Englishmen. For these reasons, without taking up further time, I will only say that I shall vote against the Motion.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he would not attempt to answer the noble Lord, because it would take him entirely through Hansard. The noble Lord had not said a single word respecting the present state of the constituencies, nor had he tried to defend those Acts of Parliament which had been palmed upon the country as remedies for bribery and corruption. For the existing evils there was really no remedy, except the substitution of a system which had succeeded everywhere for a system which had failed wherever it had been tried. He should certainly take a division, with a view of eliciting the expression of opinion of honest reformers, who were driven to a point, but were no doubt prepared to express that view which was their honest opinion.

AGRICULTURAL POPULATION (IRELAND).—RESOLUTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to call attention to the emigration of the Agricultural Population from Ireland, and if any excuse was required for its introduction it would be found in the conflicting statements as to the condition of Ireland which had from time to time been made by different members of Her Majesty's Government. In the year 1860 the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, then Chief Secretary for Ireland, said that there was in the world no more striking instance of the growth of national prosperity than was to be found in Ireland, but in a very short time he was contradicted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said that public attention had not been sufficiently awakened to the calamities which afflicted that country since the year 1859. The statements of the Members of the Government, however, were in their turn denied by the Irish Members, who insisted upon the existence of a more widely spread distress than was admitted from official sources; and in the face of that diversity of statement, it was not wonderful that the Irish people should seek for authentic information on a subject which so nearly concerned them. In March last, he (Mr. Hennessy) called attention to the depopulation of Ireland, and showed that there was a decline of 3,000 in the population of that country every week, and also that the emigration from Ireland at that moment was greater than at any other period during the last ten years. The number of persons who left Ireland in 1861 was 64,292; in 1862, 70,117; in 1863, 117,820; and the Emigration Commissioners stated in their Report, published a few days ago, that if the emigration continued throughout the year 1864, at the rate which it had gone on during the first three months, the number that year would be 156,000; and that depopulation was taking place in a country in which the number of marriages was declining, the proportion of births to deaths was falling off, and the population was declining more rapidly than that of any country in Europe. The emigration was distributed generally over the country. In 1863 the number of persons who emigrated from Leinster was 15,000, Munster, 55,000, Ulster, 22,500, and Connaught, 18,000. From the year 1851 to December, 1863, the total loss by emigration had amounted to 1,431,000 persons, of whom the so-called flourishing province of Ulster had contributed no less than 400,000. The emigration had been regarded by some Members of the Government as possessing a satisfactory character. When the attention of the Lord Lieutenant, for example, was called to the decline of the population, he said that although the grain crops would decline, the green crops and live stock would increase, and both he and the Chief Secretary said that one effect of the emigration would be to diminish poor rates, and increase the rate of wages in Ireland. The fact was, however, that while emigration had been increasing, both the live stock and the green crops had diminished. Last year there were in Ireland 23,715 horses less than there were in 1862; the decline in the number of cattle amounted to 116,615; sheep, 152,201; pigs, 89,522. The total loss of live stock in the year 1863 amounted in value to £1,227,041, the loss in the previous year having been £1,500,000. The cereal crops diminished in 1862 by 72,000 acres, and in 1863 by 144,000, and in both years the green crops also decreased. In 1863 their decrease amounted to 19,358 acres, and the total loss of cereal and green crops in 1863 was 164,077 acres. Mr. Donnelly, in his last report, stated that the total of bogs, waste and unoccupied lands of Ireland had increased to the extent of 74,856 acres. There was no increase worth notice last year, except an increase in the cultivation of flax and meadow-land; but making allowance for that increase, there were 100,000 acres out of cultivation. The prediction that emigration would diminish the poor law expenditure was by no means confirmed by the statement made by the Poor Law Commissioners in their last Report, dated March, 1864. They said that the tide of emigration had had little effect upon the expenditure of the poor rates beyond the amount which the guardians had expended in assisting the emigration of poor persons who might otherwise have become chargeable to the rates. The parties who emigrated at their own expense were not such as would have been likely to become chargeable, but it was possible that some increase of expense might arise from their leaving behind them dependants or relatives who might be either temporarily or permanently thrown upon the rates. He found that in 1863 the Poor Law expenditure increased by £37,000, and the number of paupers in that year exceeded the total in the previous year by 26,000. For the first eight weeks of 1864, the only period as to which information was in the possession of the House, the rate of pauperism had increased from 68,000 on the 2nd of January, to 76,000 on the 20th of February—that was to say, at the rate of 1,000 a week. The third prediction of Her Majesty's Government had therefore failed, like the other two. With regard to the rate of wages, recent information had been gained before the Select Committee upon Irish Taxation appointed on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for the Queen's County, to the proceedings of which some prominence was given in the public papers. The hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Maguire) was questioned before that Committee as to the condition of the labouring classes, and said he could not conceive how they could make the two ends meet with the wages they received. In his part of the country he could procure as many men as he wished for 1s. a day, and they were most thankful to get it. That statement ought to be put in contrast with that made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Colonies when bringing in his Tenant Right Bill, to the effect that wages in Ireland were ordinarily 1s. 3d. a day. If that assertion were accurate, a positive decline, instead of an increase, had taken place in the rate of wages. Mr. Lambert, the treasurer to the county of Mayo, before the same Committee, said that the country was in a more depressed condition than in former years, and that the condition of the labourers was not as good as before the famine. The Rev. Mr. O'Regan, P.P., spoke from his own knowledge of three counties—Kerry, Limerick, and Cork—and said—

“In my part of the country for certain portions of the year men are very gratified if they can get occupation at 9d. per day.”

An hon. Friend of his who sat on the benches opposite, who owned large property in the King's County, and was chairman of one of the principal railways in Ireland, declared to him in conversation that the Government never made a greater mistake than in prophesying a rise in wages, as both his private and public experience led him to believe that the rate of wages was declining. Of the four benefits then promised by the Government none were found to exist. The population was not only diminishing, but at a rate more rapid than heretofore; the quantity of live stock and of crops, green as well as cereal, was growing less and less, wages were falling, whereas poor rates and pauperism were actually on the increase. With regard to the condition of those unfortunate subjects of the Queen who were driven to leave Ireland he wished to say a few words, and to correct some misconceptions that were abroad. People generally were under the impression that of the emigrants from Ireland all went to the United States, and went with the intention of enlisting in the Federal army. Of the 117,000 who emigrated from Ireland in 1863, 94,000 went to the United States, but as many as 18,000 went to Australia, 4,000 to Canada, and the remainder to other places. Of the total number of 56,000 persons described as general labourers, 40,000 went to the United States and 14,000 to Australia. Of 9,000 farmers, 6,500 went to the United States and 1,500 to Australia; of female domestic servants 20,000 emigrated, 14,000 going to the United States and 5,200 to Australia. The question whether emigrants entered the ranks of the Federal army, and in what proportions, was one of much interest, and some light was thrown upon it by a comparative return which the Emigration Commissioners had published, giving the numbers who emigrated in the last two years preceding the war. The number of Irish single men who emigrated to the United States amounted in 1859 to 37 per cent, and in 1860 to 38 per cent, of the total emigration. During the progress of the war the proportions had been 33 per cent in 1862 and 38 per cent in 1863. The actual numbers of Irish single men who emigrated in those years respectively were—in 1859, 22,000; in 1860, 30,000; in 1862, 19,000; and in 1863, 53,000. The proportion of single men who emigrated since the war began was, therefore, less, if anything, than before it commenced. The Commissioners observed that—

"Of those who went out many, no doubt, enlisted; but their number could have but little effect in keeping up the strength of the Federal armies. It must be borne in mind that by the Passengers' Act all boys above twelve years of age are classed as 'single men,' and a deduction, therefore, of at least 12 per cent must be made from the single men for boys between twelve and eighteen years of age. A large proportion of the remainder emigrated as sons or brothers in families, and were, therefore, not likely to enlist. After these deductions are made there would probably not remain in 1863 more than from 20,000 to 25,000 single men out of whom the Federal army would have a chance of obtaining recruits, and it is not to be assumed that even a majority of these took service."

He mentioned these facts for the purpose of showing that the amount of Irish additions to the Federal ranks was not so great as some persons had been led to imagine. And what was the condition of the Irish emigrant arriving in America? He had recently seen a very touching letter from the Roman Catholic Bishop in Toronto written to one of the Roman Catholic Bishops in the North of Ireland, and dated April, 1864, in which he dwelt upon the lamentable condition of the Irish emigrants, and said—

"How heartrending the sight of these emigrants arriving on our wharves, surrounded by sharpers—the harpies of cities—destined to be swept like a torrent of rain into the sewers of society! Hence the hospitals, the poorhouses, and jails in the States, and to a great extent in Canada, have more than their proportion of inmates of Irish or their descendants. The emigrant ship, where all sexes are huddled together, breaks down the barriers of modesty, and opens the path, in thousands of cases, to ruin. How many a tear has been dropped by those emigrants for ever having left their home!"

The Bishop gave a touching description of the condition of the female emigrants—

"The workhouse system of Ireland is most degrading and immoral in its tendency, if the tree could be judged by its fruit. It is humiliating, indeed, to see numbers of poor Irish girls, innocent and guileless, sitting round in those large depots in seaport cities waiting to be hired. Men and women enter those places, and look round to find out the girl that would apparently answer their service. How many of them found the protection of the wolf is known only to God!"

The Canadian Bishop concluded with a strong appeal to the Bishops in Ireland to do something to prevent the Irish emigration. His high authority was corroborated by a statement put forward by a correspondent in The Times newspaper. Writing even before the war broke out, that gentleman said—

"The papers of all the large cities are filled with 'appeals' from the friends of various eleemosynary and benevolent societies and institutions for aid, in which the sufferings of orphans, widows, and children are set out in the most touching terms. Washington is filled with misery, nor have I ever been in any cities in the world in which the Irish and other poor populations appear to live in more squalor, or to endure greater privations than in the vile alleys of New York itself, Pittsburg, Baltimore, New Orleans, and the other large towns of the Union. No delusion can be greater than to suppose the poor emigrant at once attains a greater degree of physical comfort in the States than he has in his own country."

There was abundant evidence that the people of Ireland, if driven from their own country, were not driven to a soil where they could enjoy that happiness which ought to have been theirs at home. To quit their native land was in itself a misfortune which they felt more keenly, perhaps, than the people of any other country in Europe. True, there was a school of political economists which held that a country prospered as its population declined. He found Adam Smith was not of that opinion. He would invite the attention of such economists as the Secretary for Ireland and the Lord Lieutenant to those few words in which Adam Smith said, "The most decisive mark of the prosperity of any country is the number of its inhabitants." His whole work was an argument to that effect, that labour was the source of wealth, and population the source of labour. But it was said they had agricultural labour in Ireland, while what was wanted was manufacturing industry. On that subject he should like to quote another sentence from Adam Smith. He says—

"The capital employed in agriculture, therefore, not only puts into motion a greater quantity of productive labour than any equal capital employed in manufactures; but in proportion, too, to the quantity of productive labour which it employs it adds a much greater value to the annual produce of the land and labour of the country, to the real wealth and revenue of its inhabitants. Of all the ways in which capital can be employed it is by far the most advantageous to society."

He therefore asked the Government and the House to do something in the direction of keeping the agricultural population in Ireland and developing her national resources. Now, what could the House and tioning that House year after year; but he did not think they had petitioned it much that year. Their petitions had related to the land question, to the relief of the poor, to the education of the poor—all subjects of vital interest to them; yet their respectful requests had produced no effect whatever, and the result was that the people were beginning to think that to them Parliamentary representation was useless. Nothing could be more unfortunate than that they should allow the Irish people to imagine that calamities were steadily advancing upon their country, that it was fast losing its population and its wealth in every branch of industry, and yet that that House was to remain silent, without expressing its regret at such a state of decline, and without urging the Government to take measures whereby capital and labour might be kept in Ireland. On behalf of those whom he had the honour to represent he ventured to make his present Motion, and he did so, likewise believing that if that subject were fully and fairly placed before the House, the people of Ireland would receive justice at its hands. In that belief he now took the liberty of moving the Resolutions which stood in his name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House observes with regret that the Agricultural Population of Ireland are rapidly leaving the Country."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman touches two main points in connection with the condition of Ireland—namely, emigration and agriculture. But on entering into his statement on these two points he has alluded to several other matters to which I desire, with the permission of the House, at the outset to refer. He adverted to the Bill brought in by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Cardwell), to settle the question of the tenure of land in Ireland; and I must say it is unfortunate that the Irish people have not more availed themselves of the opportunities which that measure offers them. But, leaving that point, the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the different, and, as he called them, the contradictory statements of Ministers of the Crown and others as regards the condition of Ireland. On that the House must feel that when a state of depression falls upon a country it is often very difficult to determine accurately what its effects may be till time has enabled us to judge on the subject; and if, perhaps, I took too favourable a view of the condition of Ireland in 1861, 1862, or 1863, I was desirous not to paint things in worse colours than they might turn out. During those few years Ireland has passed through a serious and momentous period. Up to 1859 the prospects of that country were most flourishing, but afterwards she laboured under excessive drought, and then under very wet seasons, and the result certainly has been very disastrous. That I fairly admit. But I think the hon. and learned Member will agree with me that a wonderful revival is taking place. And although the emigration continues to a serious extent, I think I can show him that his statements on that point are not strictly correct. He thinks there are about 3,000 persons a week at this moment leaving Ireland, and also that the emigration is proceeding at a greater rate than last year and the year before. I shall be able to prove that during the month of May last there has been a sensible diminution in the numbers leaving the country. The hon. and learned Gentleman in submitting his Motion to the House laid down four propositions. He said—

"Look at what the state of the country is, and then consider what the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and others have stated, and see how different it is from the prospect which they held out."

He further stated that the land is going out of cultivation, that emigration is on the increase, pauperism is on the increase, and the wages of labour are diminishing. The hon. Gentleman read a portion of a report from Mr. Donnelly, showing that there was a diminution of land under cultivation. This, however, was partly owing to the diminution of live stock in the country, and to the land, in consequence, not being properly cropped. With respect to pauperism, I receive fortnightly returns from all the poorhouses in Ireland, and I am happy to state that during the last three or four fortnights there has been a diminution of more than 1,000 in the recipients of indoor relief in the unions of Ireland. [MR. HENNESSY: As compared with the same period of last year?] Yes. The hon. and learned Gentleman has been, I think, rather too severe upon the various Governments of this country in saying that, for the last quarter of a century, nothing has been done for Ireland. There has been, on the contrary, a most anxious desire on the part of every successive Government during that time to bring forward measures for the benefit of that country. He also complained that Sir Richard Griffith made a Report in 1845 which had never been acted upon. I can assure him that there are at the present moment between 200,000 and 300,000 acres that were bog and waste lands at the time when Sir Richard Griffith made his Report, which are at the present moment under actual cultivation.

I will now discuss the two points to which the hon. Gentleman has more particularly referred—the cause of emigration, and the condition of the agricultural population of Ireland. I will not dispute that in one sense it is painful to observe the emigration that has been going on. Every man who has a heart must feel for these poor people, who are leaving the homes of their fathers and separating themselves from their families. It is, however, to be considered that they are leaving their native land to better their condition, that they are going to join other members of their families who have preceded them, and that they have a prospect before long of remitting money to their friends at home, as other emigrants have done, to the amount of hundreds of thousands of pounds. If Adam Smith has shown that labour is the source of wealth, and that population is the source of labour, I must also maintain that Ireland has had for many years a redundant population. There have been in that country a vast number of small occupiers, the holders of five and ten acres, who did not employ labour. A country cannot be in a more disastrous condition than to have small tenures of two, five, and ten acres, which the owners cannot cultivate for their own advantage, and which hold out no prospect for the future. In a humanitarian point of view I may regret the emigration which has been going on; but considering the interests of the country, it is a benefit, and not to be regretted. Emigration has long been felt to be necessary in order to put the population of Ireland on a proper footing. When the population of Ireland was not quite 4,800,000, a Committee of the Irish House of Commons recommended a system of emigration as a necessary means of improving the condition of the people. No doubt the emigration from Ireland during the last twenty or thirty years has been enormous. I have here the exact figures, from authentic Returns. Between 1831 and 1841 no less than 400,000 persons left Ireland for the colonies or foreign countries. That was exclusive of a migration of 200,000 into England and Scotland. Between 1841 and 1851 the total number of emigrants from Ireland was 1,240,000. From 1851 to 1860 was a most important period, for not less than 1,190,865 persons left Ireland during that period. That is, no doubt, an enormous emigration within twenty years, an amount perhaps unknown in the annals of any country. I believe a great deal of the emigration that went on during the latter period is attributed by men of scientific knowledge and experience to the famine that visited Ireland in 1845, 1846, and 1847, which rendered it absolutely impossible for the population of Ireland to live upon the potato root, and obliged them to seek the means of livelihood elsewhere. There was a progressive emigration during 1861 and two following years. In 1861, 66,396 persons left Ireland; in 1862, 72,730; and last year the number increased to 117,820. The hon. Gentleman has quoted some Returns to show that a great number of these persons do not go to the United States of America. I think he is not quite accurate in those statements. A small portion, no doubt, go to Australia or Canada, but the vast majority go to the United States. I believe there is a Return that about 23,000 able-bodied Irishmen entered the Federal service last year. [Mr. HENNESSY: I said between 20,000 and 30,000.] I now come to the emigration of the present year. The hon. Gentleman said it is going on at the rate of 3,000 a week, and that it is assuming even larger proportions than in the previous year. I believe that was the case up to the month of May. The Registrar General states that the emigration during the months of January, February, March, April, and May, this year, amounts to 63,833. The emigration during the corresponding five months of 1863 was 60,246, and during the same months in 1862 only 31,259. So that the increase during the first five months of this year over that of 1862 is nearly double, and is an increase of 3,000 over that of 1863. Since the month of May, however, I am happy to say, there has been a sensible check in the stream of emigration from Ireland. In the month of May itself there was a decrease this year, compared with 1863, of 1,023 emigrants. The information I receive from Cork confirms this statement. There is evidently in the city, which is one of the most important ports of departure, a less desire to emigrate. "The vast tide of emigration," says one account, "has begun to decline in a very perceptible manner." The hon. and learned Gentleman has referred to the state of the Irish women in the United States, and there is, no doubt, a great deal of harrowing truth in the letter he read. It is too true, I fear, that there are thousands of these poor deserted Irish girls who are gaining a precarious livelihood by vice and other unhappy means. I have here a statement copied from the Cork Daily Reporter, and taken from the most authentic source, that there are no less than 30,000 Irish females who have left home and friends, and are now walking the streets of New York friendless and deserted. Well, I do hope when that statement reaches the humble homes of those who are about to emigrate, that they will take care to procure sufficient funds to enable them to do so with some prospect of success, and that their friends will see that in leaving the shores of Ireland they are, at least, placed in the hands of those at the other side of the water who will look after their future condition. The hon. and learned Gentleman in the course of his speech asserted that the emigration up to the present time has gone on to the most unparalleled extent, and no doubt it has; but he did not mention that there is a great desire on the part of Irish landlords—and I think it is very meritorious on their part—to get rid of a certain number of the redundant population on their estates, by providing them with free passages to America, in order that they may join their friends and relatives there. There is no doubt that the Reports of Committees and Commissions, over and over again—in 1826, 1827, 1830, 1836, and 1841—have all expressed an earnest hope that the landlords would do all in their power to facilitate the emigration of those who were living on their estates. I read only the other day that a noble Lord who sits on these benches, and who is a large and most respected landed proprietor in the county of Kerry—I mean Lord Castlerosse—had in the most liberal and generous manner actually paid the emigration expenses of seventy persons, all of whom were occupying small holdings and doing badly at home, and his example has been followed by others. The noble Lord thought, and many landlords thought with him, that the best way of improving the country was by facilitating the departure of those poor people, and giving them the means of joining their friends in America. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the state of Ireland now is worse than it was formerly, and he quoted the opinion of Mr. Lambert, treasurer of the county of Mayo, who was examined the other day before a Committee upstairs. But that opinion must be wholly without foundation in fact, because it is evident to anybody who looks at the Reports of the Devon Commission in 1845, and of the Commissions of 1830 and 1836, that the state of the country then was not to be compared to what it is now. In the Report of the Census Commission of 1841, it is stated that

Sir Robert Peel

"Sixty-eight per cent—i.e. upwards of 5,000,000—of the rural population consists of heads of families, without money, capital, or acquired knowledge—i.e. labourers or persons who obtain the means of existence by employments requiring little or no instruction. This may include small farmers up to five acres."

Now, I defy the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that such a state of things exists now. And in the State trials Mr. O'Connell referred to this statement as representing nearly 70 per cent of the people in a destitute condition. No one now, not even the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) will assert that the state of Ireland is anything like that pointed out by Mr. O'Connell. The Devon Commission, whose Report was published in 1845, state that there were then 2,300,000 persons in a state of absolute destitution in Ireland. Well, I put it to those hon. Gentlemen who know the country, whether that condition of things which was shadowed forth by the Census Committee of 1841 and by the Devon Commission of 1845 now exists. The hon. and learned Gentleman has alluded to those early Commissions. I have taken the pains to read as far as possible the Reports of the Commissions and Committees of 1826, 1827, 1830, 1836, and 1841, and if the House will allow me I will refer to one or two statements in those Reports, showing that from the first those distinguished persons who served upon them always advocated emigration as the sole means of reviving the condition of Ireland. In the year 1826 a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of encouraging emigration, and to them the Reports of 1823, 1824, and 1825 on the state of Ireland were referred. That Committee reported thus—

"The unemployed labourer at home necessarily consumes more than he produces, and the national wealth is diminished in that proportion."

That was the exact reverse of the doctrine laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman—that population was a source of labour and labour a source of wealth. The Committee then went on to say—

“Your Committee therefore trust that the most deliberate attention of the proprietors of land in Ireland would be called to this subject, and that they may be induced to make voluntary contributions for the purpose of emigration as a relief from those burdens which, though not legally imposed, are yet found practically to press upon them from the superabundance of the pauper population.”

Here is an extract from the Report of the Committee of 1829—

“The fact is undeniable that generally speaking there is that excess of labour, as compared with any permanent demand for it, which has reduced and must keep down the labourer at the lowest possible amount of subsistence.”

And they add—

“Your Committee would particularly wish to press upon the attention of the House that the evils of population furnishing an excess of labour above the demand for it contain within themselves a self-producing and self-aggravating principle, and that, so long as no measures are taken to restrain them, they must not only continue to exist and increase, but by their very existence must prevent the introduction of that capital which, if introduced, would diminish the redundancy by establishing a greater equality between the supply of labour and the effective demand. . . . The evils of a redundant population, with all the incidental consequences, have been universally felt and acknowledged, and various suggestions have been made for their partial relief. But your Committee cannot but express their opinion that a more effectual remedy than any of those temporary palliatives which had been offered is to be found in the removal by emigration of that excess of labour by which the condition of the whole labouring classes is deteriorated and degraded. The question of emigration as connected with Ireland has been already decided by the population itself, and that which remains for the Legislature to decide is to what points the emigration should be directed.”

In short, all the Reports say that the remedy for the evils complained of was to be found in emigration, and all urged its necessity. The following passage occurs in the Report of the Commissioners of 1836 :—

“There is not in Ireland the division of labour that exists in Great Britain ; the body of the labouring class look to agricultural employment, and to it only, for support ; the supply of agricultural labour is thus so considerable as greatly to exceed the demand for it ; hence come small earnings and wide-spread misery.”

That is but a brief outline of the expressions used in the various Reports.

I come now to the last part of the Resolution—namely, that which regards the state of agriculture in Ireland. The hon.

Sir Robert Peel

and learned Gentleman has omitted one or two paragraphs which he originally contemplated introducing in his Motion. The hon. and learned Member's Motion expresses a trust that the Government would direct their attention to the subject he has brought under the notice of the House, with a view of devising some means by which the Irish agricultural population may be induced to devote their capital and labour to reproductive employment at home. There is no doubt that the land question has a great deal to do with much of the distress that exists in Ireland. It is clear to every one who considers the question, that in any country where the seasons are uncertain and hazardous, and where the occupier cannot enter on a fair rotation of crops, he cannot easily recover himself from the loss he may incur on one crop. It is a fact that in joint-stock banks there are placed, at the rate of only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, sums principally belonging to the farming class in Ireland, amounting to upwards of £14,000,000, some portion of which vast amount the occupier of land would naturally be inclined to employ in the improvement of the land if he had a certainty of being remunerated for the investment in the course of a series of years by a fair rotation of crops. No doubt the Land Improvement Act of 1860 was intended by the Legislature to work good in that way; but I believe that every one admits that it has been to a great extent a failure. Considering the number of measures which have been passed for the improvement of land, it is to be deplored that the landlords of Ireland have not availed themselves more of the facilities placed at their disposal by the Legislature as they might have been fairly expected to do. At the same time, whatever may be proposed tending to improve the condition of the agricultural population, and the occupiers of those very small holdings in Ireland, is well worthy the attention and consideration of the House. I stated last year, in answer to the Motion of the hon. Member for Kildare, that I considered it desirable that something should be done in that direction; but I always said that, as a proprietor of land myself, I must strenuously set my face against the schemes propounded by some gentlemen in Ireland. In reference to the agricultural produce of Ireland the hon. and learned Gentleman has quoted from the returns of Mr. Donnelly, the Irish Registrar General, and has endeavoured to show that land is going out of cultivation, and that a serious state of things is occurring. No doubt it is perfectly true that with regard to the cultivation of cereals there has been a decrease in the acreage to the extent of 143,534, but at the same time there has been an increase in the acreage under flax cultivation to the extent of 64,922 acres in the present year as compared with the last. It is also a curious fact, that while the land under cultivation for wheat decreased in 1863, the produce on the diminished acreage exceeded that of 1862 by 154,858 quarters. With regard to potatoes, there was a slight increase of acreage under cultivation in 1863, amounting to some 5,000 acres, but the yield was no less than 1,927,547 tons more than in the preceding year. There has been a great movement in respect to flax, and nothing is more interesting than the facts concerning the cultivation of flax in Ireland at the present moment. I have a most interesting Return showing the enormous development of this cultivation. In 1854 there were only 151,403 acres under flax cultivation, but in 1863 there were 214,063 acres under that cultivation. This is a great development, and I hope the movement will be attended with success. I am informed that in the course of the present year there is a breadth of land under flax cultivation to the extent of one quarter more than 1863, that is to say, there is at this moment about 300,000 acres under flax cultivation. Considering the benefit which the investment of so much capital in that cultivation must produce, I think that the greatest credit is due to men like the hon. Member for Dungarvan, who was among the first to take up the question of the cultivation of flax. I was reading the other day some Returns from India, showing what has been done there by the people turning to proper account lands fit for the cultivation of cotton and tea. In 1861 the Indian cotton crop produced about £9,000,000, and in 1863 it was estimated at £43,000,000. With regard to tea, the Indian exports of tea in 1861 were worth £17,244, but in 1863 they had risen to £192,242 in value. I am, therefore, entitled to ask, why may not Ireland make an equal advance in the cultivation of flax, if people only turn their attention to it; and I trust that the expectations formed of this movement in Ireland on this subject may be realized. The hon. and learned

Gentleman referred to the waste land of Ireland, and said that from the time of Sir Richard Griffith's Report in 1845, the different administrations of the country had done nothing to remedy the state of things. That Report was not the first which was made on the subject. A Report was made and an Act passed in the Irish Parliament as far back as the year 1731, for reclaiming waste and bog land, and up to 1798 a succession of measures was passed in Ireland for the same object, but not a single step was taken to put them in execution. Even so far back as 1809 the British Government issued a Commission, which reported on the practicability of reclaiming the waste lands of Ireland. Nothing, however, was done until the Report of Sir Richard Griffith in 1845. The hon. and learned Gentleman has said that there are 6,000,000 acres of land in Ireland now lying waste, but that statement is, I think, scarcely warranted by the facts of the case. The works were commenced in 1846, the year after the Report; and since that period, of the 3,755,000 acres there stated to be improvable more than one-half have been reclaimed. Therefore, instead of the 3,500,000 acres alleged, there must, I think, be less than one-half that quantity now available for improvement. The hon. and learned Member should recollect that the Lands Improvement Acts authorize loans for the purpose of reclaiming waste lands, and that advantage has been taken of these provisions. Much, no doubt, may yet be done, but I have not the power to state, on my own authority, that the Government is prepared to recommend extensive works such as that reported on by Mr. Bateman. My hon. and learned Friend says that if we look around in Ireland we see in all directions trade, commerce, in fact, everything declining. Surely that cannot be true! We have only to read the Reports of the monthly fairs, and of the trade at Waterford, Londonderry, Belfast, Dublin, &c., to find that in every instance a very considerable development has taken place in the material prosperity of the country. Let us take the case of Waterford for example. The tonnage in 1864 was 398,771 against 386,281 in 1863, thus showing an increase of 12,490 tons, or about 3 per cent. Similar results are to be observed at Londonderry. In 1840 the tonnage of the vessels trading to Derry was 84,178 tons. In 1850 the gross tonnage was 161,539, or nearly twice as much as that of 1840, and in 1860 the tonnage was 247,121, or treble what it was twenty years before. These figures certainly do not bear out the assertion of my hon. and learned Friend. I have received letters from different parts of the country, all affording evidence of the improvement which has taken place in the state of affairs. One correspondent in Kerry writes—

"You will be glad, I know, to hear that our prospects never were brighter in this country than they are at present, and all our crops are looking splendid, thank God!"

The prospects of Ireland generally are equally good, and I might refer to the Reports from Belfast, Limerick, and elsewhere to illustrate the hopeful condition of the country, if I were not unwilling to trespass longer on the time of the House. It may be true, as the hon. Gentleman has said, that labour is a source of wealth and population a source of labour, but there may be a state of things, as in Ireland, which requires a remedy to be applied in the shape of encouragement to emigration. I agree with the hon. Member that the best capital of Ireland is the industry of her people; and none can deny that an impetus has been given to that industry. Tillage is considerably improved, and the amount of agricultural produce has been increased. In fact, capital is generally being brought into very active and successful exercise. Whatever the past may have been, this is not a time to despond in regard to the future. Ireland is essentially an agricultural country, and exertions are now being made for the establishment of farming societies, which will, I believe, be of great advantage by bringing together different classes for the consideration of matters connected with their common interests. Property is every day becoming more valuable in Ireland, and surely the comfort of the community must be on the increase. I thank the House for the opportunity of showing what has been done for Ireland, and I rejoice to think that in 1864 we do not find, as in past years, political partisans endeavouring to make capital out of the calamities of Ireland. We all of us, I hope, wish to do our best for the regeneration of the country. It has passed through several series of bad years—from 1838 to 1842, from 1845 to 1847, and lately from 1859 to 1863; but, thank God! a happier time seems to have commenced. The improvement is owing, I am bound to say, not so much to the measures of the Government as to the energy of the great bulk of the people. I hope they will continue to be animated by the same spirit, and, whatever Government may hold office in this country, I am sure that there will be an anxious and earnest desire to promote those measures that may tend to promote the advancement and prosperity of Ireland, and thereby to enhance the peace and general welfare of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MAGUIRE expressed his admiration of the tone and temper in which the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland had addressed the House. He felt certain that there was no Irish Member, on whichever side of the House he might sit, but would feel that the right hon. Baronet had risen to the dignity of his office, and had demeaned himself not only with courtesy to individuals, but with a gravity that the importance of the subject required. The right hon. Baronet had made a graceful admission that night, and one which he felt the more keenly as it had been his painful duty on many occasions to bring the state of Ireland under the notice of the House. He assured the right hon. Baronet now that the crisis was over, that he was urged to do so from an overpowering sense of his duty. It was painful to Irish Members to have to appeal ad misericordiam to the House, for they would rather see the bright than the dark side of the mantle, and he was glad to find that he had been vindicated that night by the statements of the right hon. Baronet. The statements he had made on a former occasion the House would see had been fully justified by the facts. He hoped, therefore, if such a state of things again arose, he should not be met in future as he had been in times past when urging them on the attention of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had obliterated the past by the frank and cordial manner in which he had represented the true state of things in Ireland. The hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) also deserved credit for having brought this matter under the notice of the House, because the state of things in Ireland, above almost any other question that could be named, ought to interest the Parliament and people of England. They would soon see the House in a state of great excitement, each party levelling its taunts against the other, and banding criminations from side to side in a hearty and deadly struggle for office on the subject of Denmark. In the country of Denmark, however, he had no special interest, and though he admitted its importance, he considered the condition of Ireland and how it could be improved a question of far greater gravity, and one that ought to arrest the attention of both sides of the House; and he believed that the statesman who took up the question of Ireland, and dealt with it boldly and courageously, as the late Sir Robert Peel did, would do more for his own name and honour than if he shone in a great party battle which had only a selfish object for its end. He did not expect that immediate legislation upon the condition of Ireland would follow from this discussion; but enough had been said to convince the House that there was something wrong in the state of Ireland, and to induce the Government to consider the subject during the recess, with the view of introducing some substantive legislation next Session. The right hon. Baronet had said that since 1840 a large number of acres of waste land had been reclaimed; but he had not alluded to the still more startling fact, which could not be disputed, that 200,000 acres of cultivated land had relapsed into sterility in two years. The right hon. Gentleman had also mentioned in proof of the great resources of Ireland, that £14,000,000 of capital were in the banks of that country; but the right hon. Baronet had not urged it to its proper result—namely, that the people allowed it to remain there almost useless, and unproductive, because they had not sufficient faith in the security of the great bank of nature—the land. He believed that not one-tenth of the land of Ireland was properly cultivated, and the reason was that the people had not faith in the security, and they hoarded their money with the object of leaving the country rather than of remaining in it. He believed that until the land question was settled they could not have permanent prosperity in Ireland. It was an exceptional state of things in Ireland and it justified exceptional measures, as had been stated by Lord Derby, Lord Palmerston, and every Minister that had endeavoured to interfere with the land question. There were some exceptions, but as a rule what had been done in Ireland had been done by the tenants; and therefore it was the duty of Parliament to protect the tenant, by giving him compensation for unexhausted improvements, where he was arbitrarily removed from the land. A measure of that kind would soon change the face of Ireland, for the people themselves had a capital in their thews and sinews and in their energy and industry, and there was as great a desire to be energetic and industrious in the humble farmers of Ireland as there was in the people of any country on the face of the earth; and if the Government wanted them to take their £14,000,000 from the banks, where it yielded no more than 1 or 2 per cent, they had only to give them proper security for their investments in land. England had had the sole and uninterrupted management of Ireland for the last sixty-four years. The native Parliament of that country had been destroyed. His firm conviction was that if there had been a Parliament in Ireland at this moment the state of things would have been very different, and the resources of Ireland would be developed. No matter what differences might exist about religion, or whatever causes of strife might exist, there would be sufficient self-interest to develop the resources of the country. After the lapse of sixty-four years Ireland was going back, and although there might be a little activity along her seaboard, that activity was partly factitious, because it was owing to foreign vessels bringing in food, whereas Ireland ought to be an exporting and not an importing country. There was another sign of activity in some parts. But what was it? What brought English vessels into Cork Harbour? Emigration. There were two or three vessels leaving that port every week; but a fortnight ago there were not a sufficient number of vessels to carry off the emigrants. What was the feeling of the people of Ireland on this subject? The feeling of a large portion of the people of the South of Ireland was one of utter insecurity, of disgust with the country, of a desire to change at any risk or any hazard. The Catholic Bishops and clergy and the Liberal press had done their best to dissuade the people from reckless emigration, but they could not stop the rush which was taking place from the shores of Ireland. Of course there were many reasons why the emigration was going on. Higher wages could be obtained in America and Australia; and the fact that they had relatives there of course operated as an inducement to them to cross the Atlantic; but the fact was undeniable that there was a rush from the country, which plainly showed that there was something wrong. The farmer had no security, and, therefore, he would not improve his farm, and therefore there was a smaller demand for ordinary labourers. If the farmer had security that his improvements would become his property, the face of Ireland would be changed, and, instead of being half cultivated, it would be equal to the best parts of England. The state of things was this: nine-tenths of the agriculturists of Ireland held at will. If all landlords were like the noble Lord the Member for Kerry (Lord Castlerosse) and his hon. Friend the Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell), a change in the law of landlord and tenant might not be necessary. But there were hundreds and thousands of estates which had been purchased under the Incumbered Estates Act which were a blister and a curse to the country. The owner could raise the rent of the tenant, could turn him out at a few months' notice, and possess himself of the property. Many owners had done so, and the result was that the people were discouraged and dissatisfied, and were rushing away. An Act had, it was true, been passed in 1860 with a view of improving the condition of the tenant; but that Act had turned out a dead letter, and he trusted that his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary would, during the recess, turn his attention to framing a measure by which that Act would be amended. It was admitted that since 1831 three millions and a half of people had left the shores of Ireland. It was true that some had gone to join the Federal armies. The blood of many was reeking to heaven, and called for heavy vengeance on some persons who were continuing the unnatural conflict. But if it ceased to-morrow, he believed the tide of emigration would flow on unchecked. The matter was one, he might add, which very seriously affected England herself. There was no recruiting going on in Cork, and very little in Munster. The fighting part of the population had gone to fill the ranks of the Federal army. Now, England ought rather to encourage the people to remain in Ireland than to go away. It would not be well for England to have the population of Ireland reduced to three or four millions. Some years ago it was said that emigration was a panacea for the ills of that country. But Ireland had not only bled from the veins, but from the arteries; and, surely, no one could now say there was a superabundant population. The small landowners were disappearing every day, and the number of large farms was increasing. This, then, was the proper time for a good landlord and tenant law which would allow the people to defend themselves. The right hon. Baronet had certainly spoken in kindly terms; but it would be much more gratifying if at the commencement of the next Session he would lay on the table some measure calculated to improve the condition of Ireland. He admitted that some gentlemen were endeavouring to introduce manufactures into that country; but Ireland being an agricultural country there ought to be a landlord and tenant law of a comprehensive character. Unless some change of that nature took place, if another bad season should occur, the scenes of ruin and disaster which had been witnessed would be again witnessed. The Government of Ireland by England was pointed to by Frenchmen and Italians and Spaniards as a source of shame to the latter, and Englishmen ought, he thought, to be anxious to wipe away any cause of reproach on that score by, at all events, passing a law which in the opinion of nine-tenths of the Irish people was essential to the welfare of their country. The present law was a mockery. What was required was a reality. If that was given, Ireland would be in that position which she would occupy were she governed by her own laws, her own sons, and her own Parliament.

MR. MONSELL said, the enormous increase of emigration from Ireland gave him the deepest pain, and he was convinced that if it went on the results would be most disastrous. The richer portion of Ireland, such as that with which he was connected, would probably not suffer so much, but in the poorer portions land which was yielding from 16s. to 20s. per acre rent would be turned to growing bog grass. It was time that the Government and Parliament, in the interest of the landed proprietors themselves, looked the matter seriously in the face. The experiment of bloodletting to cure the evils of Ireland had been tried often enough and had failed. The right hon. Baronet, in the quotations he had made from the Reports of various Committees and Commissioners, had not taken into account the entirely different state of things which at present existed there. The miserable cottiers which then formed so large a part of the population had almost entirely disappeared, and they had to deal with a totally different state of circumstances. It was a remarkable fact that the rural population was diminishing in almost every country. In England, during the last ten years, it had diminished from 2,000,000 to 1,900,000. In Scotland the diminution was still greater; and in France there had been a great diminution, not from emigration, but from the agricultural population seeking employment in the towns. The difference between the rate of wages in town and country in France was not nearly so great as the difference between the wages in Ireland and America, and while the people could get from Ireland in eleven or twelve days, at the rate of from £5 to £6 per head, the emigration was sure to go on if something were not done to stop it. He believed that many persons entertained mistaken notions on the subject of population. When Arthur Young was travelling in France, before the French Revolution, he said that its prosperity depended on the population being reduced by five millions. But the population of France was very much greater now than it was in the time of Arthur Young, and yet the people of France enjoyed a great deal more of comfort and prosperity than they did then. The prosperity of a country depends on the proportion between the capital and the number of hands that require employment, and during the last three years capital had been decreasing in Ireland nearly as fast as population. Unless the condition of the people improved the emigration would go on to a fearful extent. Well, then, what could be done? No doubt that was a most difficult question, but still it must be looked fairly in the face. The question of land tenure had been alluded to, and there would be no doubt that the reason why the land tenure had not been amended ten years ago by the Earl of Aberdeen's Government was the extravagant views put forward by many persons at that time—views which frightened the House, went to subvert all ideas of property, and rendered it perfectly impossible for moderate men to put forward their views. If the same enthusiasm raised by those extravagant views had been excited in favour of Sir John Young's Bill, and if that Bill had been passed, it would have done immense good in Ireland. The right hon. Baronet had spoken of £15,000,000 or £16,000,000 belonging chiefly to the Irish population being locked up in banks. Would it have remained there if it had belonged to the population of England or Scotland? In the one instance there would be security to the tenants for any improvements they might effect in their farms; in the other it was far otherwise. No better advice could be tendered to the Government than to reconsider the Bill of Sir John Young, with a view of seeing whether it could not be re-introduced next Session. Another Bill which would be of great benefit to Ireland would be a Bill such as that which the Attorney General had intimated his intention of laying on the table during the Session—a Bill for the Registration of Titles. Such a Bill based on a proper principle would tend to cheapen the transfer of land, and companies would be found springing up which would buy the large estates which were disposable, and would sell them out in small portions accessible to the people who were the possessors of the £15,000,000 or £16,000,000 of capital. Nothing would more tend to improve the condition by rousing the energies of the farming classes than to make them feel that by industry and saving they could become small proprietors. These two measures would confer enormous benefit on Ireland. There ought also to be, he would say, a good deal more of kindness of feeling displayed by the Government towards the Irish people. It might be sentimental, but there was no doubt that such hard and harsh speeches as those of the right hon. Baronet during the last two or three years, when he denied the existence of distress in Ireland, and that of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, when he refused to give them the benefit of University education without sacrificing their religious convictions, had had a great effect on the Irish people, and had made them feel that the Government was not at one with them. Under such circumstances the people said, "Let us go to other countries, where we shall be treated with greater kindness." Feeling most deeply the danger to which the country was exposed—believing that the emigration instead of diminishing was likely to increase, and that it was the interest of all parties to try and stop it—he begged of Her Majesty's Government not to remain quiescent in the matter, but to endeavour honestly to grapple with and stay the evil by removing those obstacles which prevented the improvement of the country.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN observed, that the question before the House was not a party question, and ought to be treated by hon. Members as men of business. The present state of Ireland was connected with the land system in that country, and he believed it could not be treated by rotation crops or by endeavouring to make tea gardens of the agricultural districts. The other day he was coming up from Tralee, and in the train with him were no less than eighty-three emigrants. He had seen forty or fifty coming from Tullamore. These cases were illustrations of what was going on in Ireland, and his impression was, that the day would come when not only the tenant but the landlord would suffer from the emigration. He differed from his right hon. Friend (Mr. Monsell) with regard to the measure of the Earl of Aberdeen's Government, as he did not think that was sufficient. Both sides of the House ought to unite for the purpose of settling the Land Tenure Question, and he asked the Government to endeavour to bring about such a settlement.

MR. M'MAHON said, the day had arrived when English Members ought seriously to consider the question as it concerned England. He cared more for the tenants of Ireland than he did for the Irish landlords. The tenantry of Ireland had been trying for years to obtain some measure which should induce them to stop in Ireland, but it had been refused them, and now they were seeking in America that which was denied to them at home. By going there they improved their own condition, but injured the power of this Empire. [Cries of "No!"] The power and greatness of a country depended on the multitude of its inhabitants. He would remind those hon. Gentlemen who cried "No" of the scriptural phrase—"Woe unto the people when the stranger at the gate sits in judgment." The Motion before them was—"This House observes with regret that the agricultural population of Ireland are rapidly leaving the country." Did the House view it with regret? From the tone taken by the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the manner in which his observations had been received, he feared that the House did not view with regret the fact that the people of Ireland were leaving their country. This country ought to bear in mind that those who were leaving Ireland were not vermin which it was desirable to clear off the land, but men and women, the natives of the soil, and whose labour would be lost to the place of their birth. His right hon. Friend was not exactly correct in stating that opposition had been offered to Sir John Young's Bill from the quarter to which he had referred. He confessed that his own views on the Land Question were extreme, and went much beyond those embodied in that measure, but the Members of the Tenant League in that House had given their strenuous support to Sir John Young's Bill and also to the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin. If the Government and Parliament wished to bring about a state of prosperity in Ireland, they must settle the question of landlord and tenant in Ireland on the basis on which it was settled in Prussia, in Hungary, and Germany; they must give security and fixity of tenure to the tenant, he rendering a fair value for it. They must go further and get rid of the supremacy of the Established Church, and make the people of Ireland feel that they themselves governed the country, and were not slaves.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

LORD ATHLUMNEY said, the House owed a debt of gratitude to the hon. and learned Gentleman by whom the Motion had been proposed, for of all the subjects they could discuss none more deserved their attention. As had been said during the debate, the affairs of Denmark, of Italy, of Turkey, and of the whole world engaged their attention; but what were these in comparison with the affairs of Ireland? He owned that he had been greatly surprised at the observations on the subject of emigration which had fallen from many who had addressed the House. It had been his fortune, or misfortune, to hold a prominent office in the Irish Government during the most disastrous period that had befallen any nation, and from 1846-7 onward a great pressure was placed upon the Government not to check, but to aid the emigration of the surplus population of Ireland. From that time great progress had been made in that direction. Boards of Guardians were empowered to give very considerable aid to emigration, and that movement had to a great extent encouraged the emigration that had since taken place to other lands than our own colonies. The Irish people were deeply attached to their native land, but the warmth of their family affection was unbounded, and there was scarcely a poor family in the distressed districts of Ireland which had not a friend or relation in America beckoning them on to a happier and a better lot. What means had the Legislature of counteracting such a movement? It had been stated that within fifteen years the enormous sum of over £12,000,000 had been sent from emigrants in America to their relatives or friends in the United Kingdom, but principally to Ireland; and that was a specimen of generosity unparalleled in history. Meanwhile, what had happened at home? While the poor were receiving money to take them away, had anything been done to fix their lot in Ireland. There had been three bad seasons, and the small farmers were beginning to think that they would be unable to hold their ground. Their grasp on the land, so to speak, had been loosened, and when invited to go and share the happier lot of their friends they were asking whether it would not be better to accept the invitation. Even recent legislation adopted in a kindly spirit towards the people, had by its tendency to increase evictions unintentionally aided in the removal of the people from the soil. Thus Parliament, with regard to certain tenements, had imposed upon the landlord the duty of paying the rates. Hard times followed; the landlord received no rent, but he had to pay the rates, and who could wonder at his wish to preserve himself and his property as far as he could from ruin? The effect of such a measure might be imperceptible, but it must have some effect in the direction he had suggested. Then, had the Irish landlords done all they could to induce their poorer tenants to remain? Had the condition of these poor people been improved—had they been made as comfortable as they ought to be? Why, the Irish people were at that moment the worst lodged of any people—he was going to say on the face of the earth, but certainly in Europe. Then, with all these inducements to go, and with so few inducements to remain at home, was it astonishing that emigration should continue? Could anything be done to stop it? No! And when it was remembered that these poor persons were going to a happier land, where they would have better wages, better clothing, and better lodging, he thought the Legislature ought not to stop emigration even if they could. This state of things must be left to find its own level. Parliament could do nothing. He had listened to the debate in the hope of hearing some real remedy, but he had heard none that was likely to receive the sanction of the House, and even if it received that sanction he doubted its efficacy. It was said that if the land question were settled, if security was given to the tenant, such an outpouring of wealth would follow as would gratify the most ardent patriotism. But what prospect was there of that? The land question was a very delicate one. It ought to be fairly considered, and the whole truth should be told. What was really the difference at that moment between the Irish tenant and his landlord, and the English tenant and his landlord? He was told that in England the landlord made the improvements, and in Ireland it was the tenant; but if so that was all a matter of bargain. If the English landlord did make improvements, he required a higher rent from his tenant in consequence. Let hon. Members take care that in urging the question they did not injure the Irish tenant. If both parties were put upon their mettle what would happen? If the English system were introduced into Ireland the consequence would be the introduction of English tenants into that country. Landlords in Ireland would then look for men who had a capital of £10 per acre, without which no tenant would be received. The House might depend upon it that the land question must remain as it was—a question of agreement between the parties. The Irish landlord had a very delicate duty to perform. He should perform that duty with forbearance, kindness, and consideration, but more than that he could not do. The real want of Ireland was a state of security. It was useless asking that House to pass a law which could only have the effect of making matters more insecure than they were at present. In all their dealings with the Irish people they should endeavour to show that they were their friends, that Parliament and the Government desired to assist them, and such conduct would do more towards bringing about a better state of things than any meddling with the land question. If the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) met with any response in that House, he should despair of any real improvement, because the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman was equivalent to taking property from one set of men and giving it to another set. Under the sanction of Parliament, property had been sold in the Incumbered Estates Court of a value exceeding £20,000,000; and the House, by showing itself determined to maintain the great landmarks of property, would do more to tranquillize Ireland and to obtain the confidence of the people than by any rash meddling between landlord and tenant, and by exciting hopes which it would not in any way gratify.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, I cannot refrain from congratulating the noble Lord upon the excellent observations he has made, and in so doing I cannot but remember the efforts he has made to remedy some of the evils which we all deplore. I remember that I had the happiness of supporting a measure for improving the habitations of the poor in Ireland, which was introduced by the noble Lord. He has, however, omitted some of the causes which have led to the present condition of Ireland, and it is very unjust to charge upon the Parliament of this country the evils which have unquestionably overtaken the people of Ireland. When the Irish Parliament was in existence, a class of 40s. franchises was created; and I have heard old men describe the condition of the small occupiers, and the miserable dwellings of those who, as a class, existed only to gratify political ambitions. Then he was a man of the most importance who could bring the largest number of small occupiers to the poll, and the result of that state of things was a great social and political evil. If the same course should be tried here, or in any country, the result would be the same. In describing the causes of emigration the noble Lord also forgot to mention one very important cause—the repeal of the Corn Laws. At the time when that question was discussed here it was always said that sooner or later the real effects of the repeal of the Corn Laws would be felt in Ireland. The hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) who has spoken in such strong terms as to the causes of the misfortunes of Ireland, should have remembered that Mr. O'Connell and the whole body of Irish Liberal Members in this House supported the change, which they were warned must ultimately produce a most serious effect upon the fortunes of their country. The measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws was carried, I believe, by the votes of seventy Irish Members—votes, no doubt, given in a patriotic spirit, but no one can doubt that the effect of that measure has been to make the profitable cultivation of small farms of from six to ten acres a sheer impossibility. In considering the causes of the present state of Ireland these are not facts to be overlooked. Although I do not often agree with the Edinburgh Review, yet I do agree with an article which appeared in that review a few months since, which was written in an impartial spirit. The unknown Whig, its author, stated that all legislation of this House of late years has gone against Ireland. That is quite true, although it was never intended to inflict injury or to do injustice to the country, but simply to carry out the theories enunciated with such marvellous eloquence by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. Member for Dungarvan has given notice of a Motion upon the paper duty, but he must know that all the paper mills in Ireland have been destroyed. In carrying out great theories, put forth with great ability by such men as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we must not be surprised if such consequences follow. It is not long ago that being on a visit to a large farmer in Ireland he pointed out to me as remarkable a man who farmed fifteen acres. He explained it by saying that under the present system, having regard to the price of corn and the climate and condition of Ireland, it was next to impossible for a man to support himself upon a farm of fifteen acres. If that be so, we have only to refer to the tables of statistics, and find out how many farmers of that class there are in Ireland, and then we shall know how many there are to be disposed of in some way or another. The noble Lord is right in saying that the small farmer in Ireland begins to find out that he cannot keep his place in the country. I believe that it is so, and with the noble Lord I think it is a matter of regret. If I am asked why in the county of Armagh the small farmers manage to live, I would reply that they pay their rent when due and continue to live because they produce an article for which they have a market—flax. But as to the pure agricultural districts of Ireland it is impossible for men to live upon such small farms. If that small measure of revolution be given which is proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford—who is speaking less in this House than upon the hustings—what will happen? He spoke of Hungary and of Prussia. I know nothing of Prussia, and there is no country I care less about, or whose examples should have less influence with us. But I have been recently in the county of Wexford, and I found it a thriving county, the farmers in good condition, the landlords and tenants upon good terms, and a strong Conservative spirit pervading them all. I agree entirely with the noble Lord that the tenantry ought to be treated with generosity and kindness, and that is how they are treated in the part of Ireland from which I come, where there are peculiar customs which tend to keep them in the country, and where there is a branch of trade which enables the poor man to live which does not exist in other parts of Ireland. If you can introduce that industry into other parts of the country, you may enable the small man to live, but I am afraid that the legislation which you have adopted, and which you will never retract, and the principles which you have laid down, and which a majority of this House are determined to carry to their legitimate conclusion, will and must tend to continue, and it may be to increase, the emigration from Ireland. I do not entirely agree with the noble Lord that that is a matter for satisfaction—[Lord ATHLUMNEY: I did not say so]—a matter which Parliament can do nothing to avert. Parliament can do a good deal when it chooses, and Government can do something when a Government exists which wishes to do something; but a great many Governments exist which wish to do nothing. I should be the last person to cast censure on the Chief Secretary, who has traversed Ireland and seen a great deal, and who knows a great deal about the country. He seems to think that the emigration must continue, but I venture to express my regret at its existence to so great an extent, and I think that there is nothing extravagant in asking the Government, as this Resolution does, to consider a subject of such a startling character, and not for the purpose of introducing any Utopian measure, but with the view of ascertaining whether it may not be possible to do something to alleviate that which every right-minded man must regret.

Mr. BLAKE regretted being obliged to differ from the noble Lord opposite (Lord Athlumney) in much that had fallen from him, particularly in the satisfaction with which he viewed the expatriation of the Irish people, and his belief that emigration was desirable for their interests and that of the country. The noble Lord had asked, what better remedy could be suggested under the existing state of things? He was sorry he was not answered by some one more eloquent than he was; but the remedy was so simple, that expressed in the plainest language it lost nothing of its force, and that was, to cherish the people whom famine and emigration had spared, by securing them just compensation for improving the letting value of the land. If the Irish farmer were assured that he would not be wholly deprived of the fruits of his laborious industry, his toil and savings would be expended on the land, which, if properly cultivated, was quite equal to supporting in comfort many more than now derived a miserable existence from it, and the landlord would have increased security and better rents. The noble Lord had said that, practically, there was little difference between the course pursued by the English and Irish landlords, as if the former made the permanent improvement they put on an additional rent for their outlay, and that the latter let their land for less money on account of the tenant making these improvements. Now this difference, which his Lordship thought so little about, accounted both for the prosperity of the English tenant and the misery of the Irish one. The first was not called on to expend his capital and labour, on first taking possession, on constructing a homestead, main drainage, fences, gates, &c.—all that was done for him by the landlord; whilst the Irish tenant had to do it all himself, and for years had to work against the dead horse. True, the Englishman had, perhaps, to pay 6 per cent additional on his rent for the outlay of the landlord; and, unless he had spare capital, surely it was infinitely better for him to do so, and to be free to devote all his resources to the proper development of the soil. But not only had the unfortunate Irish peasant to incur all this cost, but he ran the risk of offering the landlord an inducement to raise his rent or to dispossess him altogether, in order to have the benefit of the increased value of the land created by his industry. And this was no theory; there were thousands upon thousands of instances where it had occurred, and, unfortunately, were still occurring. No wonder, therefore, that the people abandoned the country, that its productiveness decreased, and that discontent and disaffection prevailed. There were many noble exceptions, he fully admitted, to the practice which too generally prevailed; and he was glad to say the noble Lord was one of them, as he showed himself a kind and considerate landlord over his large estates in the North of Ireland. The House furnished many examples of what proprietors ought to be—for instance, the Junior Lord of the Treasury and the Member for the county Clare—and it was only sought to make men not so well disposed, to do by law what others did of their own free will. Those who acted with him (Mr. Blake) had been charged with putting forward extravagant demands, which could not be complied with. Now he could say, on their part and his own, that they would be well satisfied with either of two things—the tenant-right custom, as it existed in the North, and which made it not only the most flourishing part of Ireland, but also the most advantageous both for landlord and tenant, and where agrarian disturbances were rarely heard of; or pass a similar measure to that introduced by Lord Derby's Government some years ago, and which passed the Commons but was shipwrecked in the Lords. He differed very widely in many things from the Chief Secretary for Ireland, but he could not but admire the moderate, able, and generous speech he made that night. He was always grateful when kind words were spoken of Ireland, and a disposition shown to serve her, and would praise the man who evinced such a disposition, no matter on what side he sat. These were very hopeful words that fell from the hon. Baronet that night, and he trusted he would realize them. His speech showed him to have possessed himself of a good knowledge of Ireland. If he would only, during the recess, inform himself still further as to her requirements, he should become convinced that the real way for preserving the country, both for landlord and Government, would be to secure to the tenant a fair share in the increased value of the land which his industry had created. He and the Friends who acted with him sat and voted on the Opposition side, chiefly because they saw that the existing Government were not disposed to do justice to the tenants. The due protection of the latter was the most vital and paramount of Irish questions beyond all comparison, and until it was settled on just terms, the distractions and misfortunes of Ireland never would cease, and it was hopeless to expect she would become prosperous, contented, or loyal.

Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Whiteside) seemed to think it was in the power of any Government to apply some remedy to the emigration taking place in Ireland. Now, he wished the right hon. and learned Gentleman had thrown out a hint as to the nature of the remedy. He believed that some such Bill as that introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the late Lord Chancellor for Ireland would do much to stop the exodus. He should like a distinct answer from the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to whether he would be prepared to bring forward such a measure if he was in power. In the present divided state of parties such a declaration might not be without its significance. The other evening the Government only had a majority of seven, and it might turn out that hon. Gentlemen might compromise some of their opinions in favour of the right hon. and learned Gentleman if he would make some such pledge as this, although he did not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would go the length of reimposing the Corn Laws.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, that no measure of tenant-right would enable the small farmers of Ireland to hold their own. The only remedy for the depressed state of the country would be the development of trade and commerce. Some advantage might be gained from the cultivation of flax, but those who thought that that article could be immediately cultivated to a large extent would be disappointed. It was a matter for serious consideration, whether it was fair to impose the same taxation upon an undoubtedly weak country like Ireland as was paid by one which had the greater means of prosperity, by the development of trade and commerce which were possessed by England.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that as an Irish Member and an English landlord he had taken a great deal of trouble to examine the relation between landlord and tenant in Ireland, and he must confess he had always felt at a loss to understand the conduct of Irish landowners. An English landlord, when a farm fell vacant, put all the buildings into thorough and tenantable repair, knowing very well that unless he did so he might get a tenant, but not a first-rate one, and that his rent would be unsafe. English landlords supplied the tiles for drainage purposes, and expected the tenants to put them in; and in case a tenant grubbed up waste land he was allowed to hold it for a certain time without increase of rent, and after he had obtained fair remuneration for his outlay the proper increase in his rent was determined by valuation. He felt sure that if Irish proprietors dealt in a similar spirit with those holding under them, they would have a happier and more contented tenantry to deal with. The reason why a similar system was not pursued in Ireland

he did not know, and he had never been able to find out. If the Irish landlords persisted in neglecting to do what was just, the Legislature, in his opinion, ought to step in and compel them to deal more satisfactorily with their tenants. When the tenant-right agitation was in full strength he had never agreed with the legal notions of its leading advocates, knowing that the views of law which they put forward had no warrant in the history of any country, and were not countenanced by any legal authority. They advanced the doctrine of emphyteusis, which did not apply to the matter, misinterpreted portions of the civil law, and constructed a theory of mutual rights in the soil to which the only thing at all like a parallel was found in India, where it had been productive of endless mischief. At that time feelings were so violently excited that the advocates of tenant-right could not be reasoned with. At present there was no violent agitation in Ireland, and advantage ought to be taken of the prevailing calm honestly and usefully to grapple with the difficulty. It was very well to tell people that in America they would be better off. The heart-rending scenes witnessed on their departure showed that they left unwillingly; they felt there was no place like home, and their right to live in their own country could not be disputed. It was, therefore, with deep regret that he learnt there was a common practice of dispossessing tenants at the end of their term without any compensation for improvements, and of setting up their holdings to auction. [Cries of "No!"] He hoped such was not the case in the districts of which hon. Members had cognizance, but he knew that the practice prevailed to a formidable extent.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, it must be owned that the House has listened to a very interesting debate upon a subject which must have excited very strong feelings on the part of every one interested in the national welfare. At the same time, I hope that the hon. and learned Member who brought forward the Motion will be content with the expression of feeling which he has elicited from all sides of the House, and be satisfied to leave the matter as it stands, without pressing his Motion to a division, which might imply a difference of opinion that really does not exist. It is very much to be lamented that circumstances should induce a large number of the people of Ireland to emigrate from their own land. At the same time, I cannot join with those who lament this on account of the emigrants themselves, because, if they go to a country where they are in a better position than they were in in their own, and acquire wealth and comfort, as far as the individuals are concerned you cannot regret the change in their circumstances. A proof of their improved condition is afforded by the fact that the Irish who emigrate to America send enormous sums of money to their friends in Ireland—in one year of the famine as much, I believe, as £1,500,000. These remittances show that the persons who were able to send them must have been in comfortable circumstances, and in the receipt of good wages; and they likewise do the greatest possible honour to the Irish people, because, however large may have been the means of those emigrants, in the money sent home to their friends and relations an amount of self-denial is implied, an amount of affection involved, reflecting the highest credit on the hearts and feelings of the Irish people. We have been told by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, that this emigration arises from the repeal of the Corn Laws, the repeal of the paper duty, and other liberal and enlightened measures of Imperial legislation. When he calls on the Government to apply a remedy to the evils he laments, he cannot, I presume, mean that we should re-enact the Corn Laws, re-enact the paper duties, change our spirit duties, and alter all those things to which he ascribes the flow of emigration from Ireland to America. Then we are told that tenant-right would remedy the evils complained of; that if we were to adopt a change of law regarding landlord and tenant, instead of leaving that relation to be dealt with by bargains between man and man according to the plain and simple doctrine that should regulate transactions of that sort—if we would only pass some law which would impose an obligation on the landlord that, as I apprehend, would transfer part of his property eventually to the tenant, that would form such an inducement as would prevent the Irish people from going to America. Now, all these remedies appear to me wide of the mark. It is a simple question of the law of level; and this the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick illustrated very clearly. Its operation is shown in every civilized country in Europe. In England the rural population is gradually flowing from the country to the towns. Why? By the law of level, and because they get better wages in the towns than in the rural districts. In France it is the same. When we talk of Irish emigration, we confine ourselves to the emigration to America, and forget that there is a very great Irish emigration to this island. We forget that every seat of industry in England and Scotland swarms with Irishmen, who have emigrated because they thereby obtained better employment and better wages. In Glasgow, Liverpool, Birmingham, Bristol, South Wales, London, in every part of this island where there is a great demand for labour, and where the wages are high, you find Irishmen flock and settle. Why? Because they are tempted by high wages, better employment; and next, because, being admirable workmen, those who employ labour find it to their interest to employ the industrious Irishmen, and are glad to pay them those wages which make it worth their while to come and stay there. You cannot by any legislation alter that state of things. You cannot alter the laws that regulate human society by any artificial regulations. And this hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on the point this evening admit by their prospective apprehensions, because they say that, great as the emigration is now, yet when the civil war in America shall end that emigration will be much greater. Why? Because the increased demand for labour in America will increase the temptation to Irishmen to go from their own country to America. The thing I lament is not that so many Irishmen go to places where they find themselves better off and more prosperous than in their own country, but that from a great many circumstances owing their origin to an early period long gone by, and a state of things now happily ceased, Ireland is not in such a state that Irishmen find within their own country those inducements to and rewards of labour which they find in other countries. I lament that the rewards of labour are so low in Ireland, and should be glad if anything were pointed out that would tend to alter and improve that condition of things. Part of it arises from the dispensations of Providence in regard to the physical arrangements of the country. There are not in Ireland those great stores of coal which are to be found in many parts of England and in America, and which afford an easy employment for capital and labour. But there are in Ireland great means for many kinds of manufacturing industry. There is no country where there is greater abundance of water power—and water power is in many cases as good as steam power for manufacturing purposes, and I cannot understand why capitalists who intend to employ their capital in manufacturing operations do not go to Ireland more than they do. They would find it to their advantage to do so. I know it is sometimes said that capital is not so secure there; but that, I think, is a great mistake. We hear, no doubt, of agrarian outrages from time to time, but these are totally independent of the operations of manufacturing industry; and I am quite satisfied that any capitalist going to Ireland and taking advantage of its natural resources, both in material power and human labour, would find just as great security as in England, and from the abundance of water power and labour would find it answer his purpose. I trust that is taking place gradually. We heard the other day, I think, of Mr. Whitworth going to establish manufactures in Ireland. One example of that kind will lead others to follow, and I am quite confident that of all things most likely to arrest the tide of emigration would be not attempting to do so artificially and against the laws of nature, but holding out to Irishmen those inducements to labour which they are now obliged to seek across the Atlantic. There is another thing that tends to increase this emigration—the greater facility which steam navigation affords for the passage—not only the greater rapidity in point of time, but the greater cheapness in point of money. It is impossible by any artificial arrangement you can devise to change the laws of nature, or to prevent people going where they consider their position will be greatly improved. All you can do is to endeavour to improve their condition in their own country, and add inducements that may lead them to continue at home. As long as they can improve their condition by going to America, it would be unkind to do anything to prevent them. I quite agree with my noble Friend (Lord Athlumney) that there are no people who are so open to the effect of affection and kindness as the Irish, and no doubt much depends on the conduct of landlords towards their tenants. I think an immense improvement has taken place in that relation of late years. In former times the landlord and occupier of the soil had no common relations whatever. The land was generally let in large lots on long leases for three lives or sixty-one years. The man who had the lease subdivided the land again to other people, by whom it was again subdivided, and those who lived on it had no relations to the real landlord. There was no kindly feeling between them because they had nothing to do with each other, and when the middleman disappeared and the landlord and tenant came together, they had not the reciprocal kindly feelings which are necessary for the social welfare of the country. Well, that state of things is over. I am sure anybody who knows Ireland must know that the landlords are taking much greater interest in their tenants, in everything connected with the comfort of their habitation, in the establishment of schools, and all the other arrangements by which tenants are made to feel their landlord's care for them. Those relations are extending and taking deeper root in the country. I should therefore hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman who made this Motion will not really press so very general a Resolution as this, which would appear to impose on the Government duties which are not expressed, but that any Member who thinks he can produce a particular measure that would contribute to the result he desires will have the goodness to do so, and it will be duly considered; but the affirmation of a Resolution so vague as the present, would merely lead to expectations which would not be realized, and would only tend to aggravate the evils we all deplore.

MR. HENNESSY said, he could not help remarking that the Resolution had been supported by all the Irish Members who had spoken. The first part of the Resolution was—

"That the House observes with regret that the agricultural population of Ireland are rapidly leaving the country;"

and the next part was—

"That the House trusts Government will direct their attention to the subject, with the view of designing some means to induce them to devote their capital and labour to reproductive employment at home."

The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said he would be inclined to support the latter part of the Resolution. The only Question, therefore, was, whether they should express their regret at the people leaving the country?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he should move the Previous Question.

Whereupon Previous Question put, "That that Question be now put."—(Sir George Grey.)

MR. WALPOLE said, before the Question was put he wished to make an appeal to the hon. and learned Member for the King's County. He had listened to the debate with great interest, and he must say he had never heard a debate upon an Irish question conducted with greater ability, or conveying more useful information on both sides of the House. He thought that the hon. and learned Member for the King's County had made out a strong case for the second part of his Motion. He considered, however, that if the first part were carried it might lead to apprehensions as to the opinions expressed in reference to emigration. At the same time, if the Motion were negatived, it would most likely leave an impression on the people of Ireland by no means advantageous as regarded the feelings which existed in that House in reference to the relations between the Government and the people of the sister country. He could not conceive any better solution of the difficulty in which the House was placed than to accept the assurance given by the noble Viscount in his admirable speech. He (Mr. Walpole) must therefore say, that if the hon. Member for the King's County should, notwithstanding, go to a division, he should support the Motion for the Previous Question.

MR. MONSELL said, he would venture to make an appeal to the hon. and learned Member for the King's County, grounded on the enormous importance of that Question, and the extreme undesirableness of anything like a difference of opinion being exhibited to the country when they were substantially all agreed. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had echoed almost every sentiment expressed by the hon. Mover of the Resolution, and the hon. Gentleman would really injure his own cause by dividing the House.

MR. LEFROY said, he had not the advantage of hearing the former part of the debate, but he must say that the statements made by the hon. Baronet below him (Sir George Bowyer) were as unfounded and as unbecoming a man who professed to know anything of Ireland as anything he had ever heard. If the House were forced to a division, he should feel it impossible to support that vague and indefinite Resolution. The noble Lord had stated to them most truly the real position of Ireland, and the means by which they were to arrive at its improvement.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to say a few words out of respect to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole). He had been asked not to go to a division; but what had the Government done? At the last moment, and without notice, they had moved the Previous Question. There had been a belief in the House that the Government would give way, and that there would be no division, and acting under that impression several hon. Members had gone away. The noble Lord had made a speech, in which he promised nothing, and told the people of Ireland that he did not regret the decline of the population. Except that negative fact, there was nothing in his speech. Deeply regretting to differ with the right hon. Member for Cambridge University and others, he must certainly feel it his duty to press his Resolutions to a division.

MR. ESMONDE said, that although he was as anxious as any man for the prosperity of Ireland, he felt it his duty, if the hon. Gentleman went to a division, to vote against his Resolution, which, even if carried, could lead to no practical result. He did not recollect any debate which had brought home to his mind more forcibly than had been done that night the conviction that there was something good in store for Ireland. He remembered several discussions on the subject, and several Bills which had been thrown out by the advocates of the landlord interest in the House. He thought that a want of moderation had prevented a settlement of the Question.

MR. BUTT said, he meant to vote for the Previous Question. The effect of that debate would be marred if the hon. Member who had raised it was so indiscreet as to press a division.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that although he was generally a supporter of the Government, he should call in that case upon his hon. Colleague to persevere with his Motion. To put Resolutions on the paper without seriously intending to carry them to an issue would create a bad impression in Ireland.

Previous Question put—

The House divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 80: Majority 28.

MR. HENNESSY said, he believed his second Resolution, in favour of employing the agricultural population, had not been put.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House trusts that Her Majesty's Government will devise some means by which the Irish Agricultural Population may be induced to devote their capital and labour to reproductive employment at home."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

SIR GEORGE GREY moved the Previous Question.

Whereupon Previous Question proposed,
"That that Question be now put."—(Sir George Grey.)

MR. HENNESSY said, he understood that the Secretary for Ireland had consented to the second Resolution.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had understood that the Previous Question covered both Resolutions.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he believed that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was right, but great inconvenience was occasioned by the intention of the Government not being distinctly expressed earlier in the debate. The hon. Member for the King's County had met with rather hard measures from the Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had hoped that after the appeal made to the hon. Gentleman he would not have pressed the Motion to a division. It was only when the hon. Gentleman insisted on dividing the House that the Government moved the Previous Question.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would recommend his hon. Friend not to give the House the trouble of dividing a second time. The Secretary for Ireland had led the House to believe that he would agree to the second Resolution.

Original Motion and Previous Question, by leave, withdrawn.

REGIMENTAL QUARTERMASTERS.

ADDRESS MOVED.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for an inquiry into the condition as to pay and allowances of the Regimental Quartermasters, with the view to place those officers, should it seem expedient, on a better footing. He would not enter into minute details at that late hour, but he wished to remind the House that they were as deserving a class as any in Her Majesty's service. Last July he moved for a Correspondence between the quartermasters and the authorities, which showed the vast extent of the duties performed by the quartermasters and their claims on the service. In a regiment of 1,000 men there was but one appointment to which a private might look forward with certainty as raising him to the position of an officer and a gentleman, that of regimental quartermaster. The post of regimental quartermaster must be held by a man who was raised from the ranks, but when he got into possession of the post he found it valueless. He held in his hand the services of 126 quartermasters. They had 220 medals between them and clasps without number. Their duties were multifarious. They were storekeepers, bookkeepers, and they kept the accounts of the whole regiment with the exception of the paymasters. If there were a vacancy for adjutant or quartermaster, it was given to the senior staff sergeant, whether he was quartermaster sergeant, or sergeant major. But look at the difference of the two appointments. The adjutant received 8s. 6d. a day; the quartermaster only 6s. 6d., and was it possible to live and bring up a family on that sum? Of the 126 there were only six unmarried, and upwards of 100 were married at the time of their appointment. Would not the House give those men the means of supporting their wives and children? His brother officers in the House would bear him out when he said that non-commissioned officers were usually taken from the married men, because the married men were the most steady. Those men were responsible for stores in their charge to the amount of £2,500,000; they had no end of books to keep, and if there was any loss they were held accountable. How was it then that the men came to take the appointment? Formerly the appointment was a good one, and the quartermasters hoped to see the day when they would be put upon a fair footing. Formerly the clothing was in the hands of the colonel as a perquisite. He employed the quartermaster and gave him a handsome remuneration. The regimental necessaries were then provided by the quartermaster at the wholesale prices; he retailed them at shop prices, and received the difference between the wholesale and retail. This enabled the quartermaster to save money for his family. In the colonies the quartermaster was worse off by £20 or £30 than the quartermaster sergeant, and that was a state of things which ought not to exist. He did not ask the noble Lord to promise the men a single shilling, but merely to grant an inquiry, and the result he was sure would be to give these poor men what they deserved. He had intended to move for a Royal Commission, but if the noble Lord would grant an inquiry in a modified form he would not push his Motion to a division. He begged to move an humble Address to Her Majesty, praying that She would be graciously pleased to grant an inquiry into the condition, position, pay, and allowances of the Regimental Quartermasters in Her Majesty's service.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct an inquiry to be made into the condition as to provision, pay, and allowances of the Regimental Quartermasters of Her Majesty's Service."—(Sir Frederic Smith.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it would appear upon investigating the claims of that most deserving class of non-commissioned officers, that the rate of pay which they received, more especially upon first appointment, was extremely low. He did not, however, at all admit that because the adjutants or paymasters received a higher rate of pay the quartermasters also ought to receive it. All that the House and the Government had to look to was that a meritorious class, as the quartermasters were admitted to be, should not be asked to serve for an inadequate remuneration. He had reason to believe that their remuneration was inadequate. The Secretary of State, however, did not think it his duty to come forward with any proposition to that House to raise the pay and allowances of the quartermasters without first making minute inquiry. It seemed to the noble Lord (Earl de Grey) that a competent tribunal might be composed, partly of officers who had a practical acquaintance with the duties the quartermasters had to discharge and a practical knowledge of their position, and partly of gentlemen who should represent the Treasury. Such a Committee would be appointed as soon as possible, and the Government would be prepared to act upon their recommendation. He hoped that statement would be satisfactory.

Question put, and agreed to.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. O'HAGAN, referring to the circumstance of the abrupt termination of the proceedings in Committee upon this Bill on the preceding day, moved that

"This House will, on Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House to consider further of the progress of the Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill."

It appeared from a work which was a high authority upon the proceedings of that House, that this was the proper course to pursue.

MR. LONGFIELD opposed the Motion. It did not appear from the references to the Journals in the work to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded, and which was undoubtedly a work of the highest authority, that there had been a single case in which, after the Chairman had been moved from the Chair on a division taken, a Bill had been revived during the same Session. The passage in May's Law and Practice of Parliament, which referred to this subject, was at page 449, and was to this effect—

"Sometimes, however, the proceedings of a Committee on a Bill are brought abruptly to a close, by an order 'that the Chairman do now leave the Chair;' in which case the Chairman, being without instructions from the Committee, makes no report to the House. A Bill disposed of in this manner disappears from the Order Book, and is generally regarded as defunct; but as the House cannot be bound by the decision of a Committee, and has not itself agreed to any vote by which the Bill has been postponed for the Session, it is competent for the House to appoint another day for the Committee, and to proceed with the Bill."

He admitted that this work was a most valuable compilation; but it did not appear from the Journals that there was any instance in which a Bill had, under these circumstances, been proceeded with. The first precedent cited by Mr. May was from 90 Commons' Journals, page 497, which was the case of the County Coroners Bill. That measure was brought to an abrupt conclusion, the Chairman being moved out of the Chair. There was no Report, and nothing further was done with the Bill that year. The second case cited was 90 Commons' Journals, page 562, the Public Institutions Bill; the third 105 ibid., page 345; the fourth, 111 ibid., 201, Justices of the Peace Qualification Bill; and the last, 112 ibid., 310; in all of which cases the Bills had a similar termination. He had also looked at the references to cases in which Bills had been revived, and not a single one appeared to be the case of a Bill, which being in Committee the Chairman was voted to leave the Chair. It must strike any one that when no Report at all was made that must be the result, because the House could take no notice of a Resolution which was not reported to it. In this very instance the Speaker had held that he, as the organ of the House, could take no notice of a division, because it had not been reported. The cases to which Mr. May had referred in support of his second position, "that it is competent for the House to appoint another day for the Committee, and to proceed with the Bill," were all cases on the consideration of the Report of a Committee, or after one report, and not one of them appeared to have been a case in which the Chairman was ordered to leave the Chair on a division taken. The first was 70 Commons' Journals, 384—the Paupers Removal Bill. In that case, as appeared by the Journals, the Chairman was not ordered to leave the Chair, but the Report of the Committee was considered, and they were ordered to re-assemble, and the Bill was re-committed. The same was the case in the second instance cited, that of the General Turnpike Bill, 82 Commons' Journals, 365. Under these circumstances, he submitted that there was no precedent for the re-instatement or revival of this Bill. If the Speaker should decide against him on that point, he thought that proper notice ought to have been given of a Motion of this kind, so that hon. Members might not have been taken by surprise.

MR. BUTT said, the very precedents to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had referred would, if he had read them completely, have shown him that there was no doubt about the authority of the House in this matter. The last precedent was that of the 27th of March, 1827—the General Turnpike Bill. What occurred with reference to that Bill no doubt took place upon an order for taking into further consideration the Report from a Committee of the Whole House, but the House then resolved to re-commit the Bill, and the Committee to which it was re-committed was in the same position as an ordinary Committee. What followed was thus entered on the Journals:—“The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee, but after some time spent therein Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair.” The meaning of that was that there was no Report. The proceedings of Committees were not then entered upon the Journals when there was no Report, but in the “Minutes and Votes” of that day the entry was as follows:—“General Turnpike Act Amendment Bill—Report for the considered Bill re-committed; considered in Committee; No Report”—which, with the exception that in this instance there was a division, was exactly the way in which what had occurred with regard to this Bill was recorded. Therefore it was clear, that on the 27th of March, 1827, when the Turnpike Bill was re-committed, the Chairman left the Chair without making a Report, and the Bill was at an end unless something took place. What else was done then? On the 9th of April an order was made in the terms which the Attorney General had adopted upon this occasion—“That this House will, upon Wednesday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, to consider further of a Bill to amend the Acts relating to Turnpike Roads in England.” The other precedent was that of the Paupers Removal Bill in 1815. In that case precisely the same entry was made in the Journals—“After continuing some time on the Committee, the Speaker resumed the Chair;” and on the 20th of June, the House set the Bill up again by order, precisely as his right hon. Friend now proposed. It was, therefore, clear that in both these cases the Chairman left the Chair without making a Report, and that the proceedings of the Committee would have terminated if the House had not exercised its inherent jurisdiction, and set it up again. In 1856 the Committee upon the Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Bill was two or three times counted out, and each time the House revived it. As to the question of notice, it had been the practice of Members, in cases in which upon the second reading of a Bill it had been resolved that the word “now” should not stand part of the Question, to replace their Bills on the Orders without giving notice. If, however, his hon. Friends opposite intended to take the sense of the House upon the question whether this Bill should be replaced in the Orders, it would, perhaps, be better that notice should be given of this Motion. He was not at liberty to refer to what occurred in the Committee, but in some place or other he did hear the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin state that his object in moving that the Chairman should leave the Chair was not to defeat the Bill.

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, that what he had done he had done upon the advice of the highest authority, and having resolved to take that course, he had communicated with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, and with the hon. Member for Mallow.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the highest authority in the House was the Speaker, who had not yet pronounced upon this Question. It was true that it was at first his intention to move that the Chairman should report Progress; but Members who were well acquainted with the forms of the House told him that the Motion which he made deliberately, “That the Chairman do leave the Chair,” was analogous to the Motion of the “Previous Question” in the Whole House, the adoption of which prevented the revival of the subject during the same Session. At any rate, whether it was possible or not, it was not usual. When a matter had been discussed and a vote taken, it was the practice of the House to have nothing more to do with it during that Session. Although the hon. Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) had displayed much ingenuity, he had not produced a precedent of a case in which a hostile vote had been taken upon a division obliging the Chairman to leave the Chair, and in which, upon a Motion made as a matter of course, the Bill had been resumed in the same Session. What he contended was, that there must be in some shape a Report from the Committee to enable the House to proceed. In the present case, however, the House had nothing before it, and according to the principle quoted from Mr. May's book, a course had been taken which had brought the Bill to an end. This was the less to be regretted, as the effect would be that the hon. and learned Gentleman would bring in a better Bill another time. It was a matter of importance that the House should conform to its usual practice. A great Judge said it did not much matter what the practice was so long as it was practice. The right hon. Gentleman in the Chair was not partial to introducing subtle distinctions in the Rules of the House, and if the question must be argued again, due notice ought to be given.

MR. GEORGE said, that in the case of the General Turnpike Bill it was plain, from the short notice in the Journals of the House, that there could have been no division, as in the case of the Bill in question, where the Chairman had been moved out of the Chair. No one disputed that where there had been a Report, a Bill would re-appear on the Notice Paper, but he contended that when the Chairman of the Committee had been voted out of the Chair by a hostile majority, the House had never interfered. There was, therefore, he submitted, no precedent to justify the interposition of the House in the present case.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield) not having favoured me with notice that he intended to raise this Question, I have been obliged to refer to the precedents since I came into the House. The House will be aware that the Committee have no power to extinguish a Bill. A Bill is referred to a Committee that it may be considered and amended; but the Committee have no power to put an end to a Bill. That power the House retains to itself. On many occasions, some of which have been quoted by the hon. Member for Mallow, the Committee has ordered the Chairman to leave the Chair, and this having been taken as an indication that the Bill is not favourably regarded by the Committee, it has not been revived by its author in the House. But it is beyond the province of the Committee arbitrarily to take a

Bill out of the power of the House and to put an end to it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University (Mr. Whiteside) has said, that when a vote has been taken on a measure, that vote must be regarded as decisive. But such a rule must not be taken without qualification. I would recall to his recollection that within the last few years the Question has been put to the House in regard to the second reading of a Bill, "that this Bill be now read a second time." The House decided in the negative—namely, that the Bill be not read a second time "now." The Motion had not been put in the usual form that the Bill be read a second time "that day six months," and it was in the power of the House, having refused to read the Bill a second time "now," to read it a second time on another day. I remember a few years ago that a Bill was brought in by the late Member for Surrey (Mr. Drummond), who not being satisfied with the decision of the House that the Bill be not read a second time "now," on a subsequent occasion moved that the Bill be read a second time; and the House, having changed its view in regard to the Bill, read it a second time, and it was ultimately passed. Now in this particular case the Bill is not extinguished and put an end to by the Chairman being moved out of the Chair. If the hon. Member for Mallow had examined the precedents with more care, I think he would have found that they do not correspond with the view he has taken of them. There is no Report from the Committee in this case. There was no Report also in the case of the General Turnpike Bill, and in that case the Bill was revived. I have not the smallest doubt that, in conformity with the distinct precedents that have been cited, it is entirely in the power of the House to order the Committee to meet again, and consider the Bill further. It will not be a case of "Progress," because, when the Chairman reports Progress, by a decision of the House which was come to fifteen years ago, the Speaker leaves the Chair without question. Inasmuch, however, as there is no Report from the Chairman, when the House is moved to go into Committee on this measure, it will be competent for any Member to raise the question on going into Committee, precisely as was done in all Bills and at all times before the rule of Progress was established. I believe that what I have now stated is, without question, in conformity with the established practice of the House. [Mr. WHITESIDE: As to notice?] With regard to the question of notice in the case of the General Turnpike Bill, 1827, the Order for the committal of the Bill was made early in the evening, and before the commencement of public business, and, therefore, I have no doubt it was done at that time without notice. Practically the Chairman being voted out of the Chair has the same effect as the House being counted out. We have a measure on which the House has been twice counted out lately, and which has been much opposed — the Weighing of Grain Bill. But although in those cases the debate came to an abrupt conclusion, there has been no question raised that the Member in charge of the Bill had not the power of putting it down for another day.

Mr. WHITESIDE inquired whether the Question before the House would be whether the Bill should be resumed?

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to raise the Question on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair.

Mr. VANCE thought it would be for the convenience of the House that notice should be given for a future day, so that Members might be aware of the course to be taken.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, that two questions were involved — one the question of form, which had just been decided by the Speaker; and the other, whether the House would think fit to revive the Committee, and that would come before the House when the right hon. Gentleman left the Chair. The Speaker having decided the question of form, the House could not be taken by surprise, and it would be competent to any hon. Member to move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

Mr. SPEAKER: No doubt it will be quite competent to any Member to move that the House resolve itself into Committee on the Bill on that day three months.

Committee to consider further of the Bill To-morrow.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. CRAUFURD moved that the Bill be committed that day three months. The law at present provided for the mode in which meetings should be called, the mode in which the poll should be taken, and the mode in which the shareholders should vote. At present a shareholder who was unable to attend a meeting was at the mercy of the shareholder to whom he might intrust his proxy; and if the hon. Gentleman desired to give the shareholder the power of giving a special as well as a general proxy, that might be a very proper thing; and if the Bill did not go beyond that there would be no objection to it. But the Bill applied to all companies. Now under the Companies' Act of 1852 companies had the power of regulating their proceedings, and directing the mode in which votes should be taken. This Bill proposed to override the powers given under that general Act. The hon. Gentleman had seen the force of that objection, and had given notice of an Amendment to exclude all companies except those constituted under special Acts. But the Bill went beyond the power of giving a special proxy paper. The present practice was for a meeting to proceed with the poll immediately, or to adjourn it to some future day; but the second clause of the Bill would compel the adjournment in every instance for seven or fourteen days, and the practical result would be to cause delay when time might be of the utmost importance. The sound principle of legislation was to lay down general rules giving a company power to make bye-laws for the purpose of carrying out its proceedings. The second clause was not only unnecessary but mischievous, because it would hamper the free action of all companies to which it applied. He thought the object of the hon. Member would be attained by giving shareholders special proxies in addition to the proxies provided by the general act; for a fortnight's notice must be given of every meeting, the special business of which meeting was required to be set out, and ample time was thus afforded to every shareholder to send a special proxy applicable to the business to be brought forward. He submitted to the hon. Member the propriety of expunging the objectionable clauses, and thus removing the objections to the Bill. In order to enable the hon. Gentleman to state the course which he intended to pursue, he begged to move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Mr. AYRTON seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Edward Craufurd,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH hoped that as the hon. Gentleman did not object to the principle of the Bill he would consent to its going into Committee. The present system of proxies enabled directors to do almost as they liked. A case occurred a few years ago, in which a Board of Directors carried a vote of £5,000 to an officer of the company by means of general proxies without the shareholders knowing anything about it until it was done. He proposed to amend the second clause by enacting that, instead of an adjournment for seven or fourteen days, that "when a poll is demanded the meeting shall be adjourned in the usual manner." He would suggest to the hon. and learned Gentleman to postpone the consideration of his objections until they got into Committee.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short Title).

Mr. W. EWART said, that having consulted the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, certain Amendments had been agreed to which removed the objections entertained by certain hon. Gentlemen, and he believed those Amendments were of such a nature as to induce the House to inaugurate the metric system, which he hoped would soon be adopted as the universal practice of the country. It had been adopted in many other countries with the greatest possible advantage, and no desire whatever had been manifested for a return to the old systems. The schedules to the Bill had been carefully revised by the most competent authorities, and he believed they would be found quite satisfactory.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (The Use of Metric Weights and Measures allowed).

Mr. W. EWART said, he should move that the clause be struck out, in order to insert an amended clause in its place.

Moved, That Clause 2 be omitted.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, he had no doubt that the proposed system would be an improvement upon the old one, but he did not like the idea of its being a permissive measure. He wished to know if the President of the Board of Trade approved of a permissive Bill on such a subject. If county A continued the old system, and county B adopted the new one, very great confusion would probably arise.

Mr. W. EWART observed, that at the present time the metric system was voluntarily used in many trades and manufactures. It was in an active state, and the object of this Bill was to promote its extension, and to render permissive that which was not now strictly legal.

Mr. HUBBARD thought the explanation of the hon. Gentleman proved that there was no necessity for the clauses which he proposed to substitute for those which had been objected to, because certain operations could now be performed by agreement against which there was no legal objection. If there were any legal restraints on private arrangements, the clause which had been prepared might be necessary; but if that was not the case the passing of such a measure might open a door for making experiments on weights and measures throughout the country. He differed from the sanguine author of the Bill, and did not believe it would be possible to introduce the decimal system in the ordinary transactions of this country. The working people were thoroughly habituated to the existing system. A penny in value and a pound in weight were stereotyped on the minds of the labouring classes. For the purposes of science every facility was at present afforded. He wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether there was at present any legal restraint on private arrangements of this description?

MR. ADDERLEY said, the restriction which at present existed was simply this—at present any one who pleased might make use of the system, but it was not recognized by any Act of Parliament, and therefore there was risk of litigation in any contracts based upon it. The present Bill simply legalized transactions which might be voluntarily entered into. With regard to the observation of the hon. and learned Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard), that the labourers were accustomed to the present system, he would only observe that it was the most complicated system in the whole world, differing, as it did, in different parts of the country. Many persons who were carrying on business on a large scale had adopted the metric system, and wished to have it legalized. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) seemed to prefer a compulsory to a permissive system. He (Mr. Adderley) had no doubt that the merits of the system would very soon bring it into general operation; but he certainly was not prepared to make its adoption compulsory on everybody.

MR. LOCKE said, that the present Act regulating weights and measures rendered it illegal to enter into any contract for the sale of goods by any other than the Imperial weights and measures; but a proviso had been introduced into the section, regulating sales by measure which legalized sales by measures other than local and customary measures, which had the effect of neutralizing that section of the Act. Then, again, the section which regulated sales by the Imperial weights contained a proviso at the end of the section, that nothing therein contained should prevent a sale by any multiple of a pound. In consequence of this proviso a sale by the long ton, which is not an Imperial weight, had been held by a decision of the Superior Courts to be legal, inasmuch as the Act did not specify that the multiple should be "numerically expressed." Therefore, in consequence of these two provisos, the object of the Act, which was to prevent sales by any but Imperial weights and measures, was defeated. However, clauses had been introduced into the Bill to legalize contracts that might be made by parties under the metric system. This was a Bill that might be passed with the greatest safety, and would not occasion any inconvenience, as the schedule contained a table of equivalents of metric and Imperial measures. In consequence of the proviso introduced into the section relating to the sale by measure, articles were now purchased in Covent Garden Market in measures of which nobody knew the contents. To obviate this inconvenience, he (Mr. Locke) had introduced a clause into a Bill which he brought in in 1858, to compel market gardeners and others selling in the market to affix to the vessels in which they sold fruit and vegetables, the amount by Imperial measure which they contained. The market gardeners opposed this clause, and, having met them at the Board of Trade, and argued the question before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, then President of the Board of Trade, that right hon. Gentleman, perhaps from being fond of agricultural pursuits, decided in favour of the market gardeners and fruit and vegetable salesmen; the clause was consequently withdrawn and the public left at their mercy. That inconvenience could never arise if the metric system were adopted. By the repeal of the two provisos in the Act regulating weights and measures, the object of that Act—namely, one uniform system of weights and measures would be obtained with one exception—that is, the reputed quart and pint bottles which enjoyed such a very bad reputation. The reputed quart should be six to the gallon instead of four Imperial quarts, but that was not the case, for you never knew what a bottle contained, or how many bottles went to a dozen. The hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Alderman Copeland) had told him that he had received an order to make some bottles which the trade called nineteen to the dozen. Why, if they went on in that way the three-bottle man would certainly not be what he was in former times, in fifty years he would not be as great a drinker as the one-bottle man was now.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY reminded the hon. Member for Buckingham that, when he, the hon. Member for Buckingham, and himself were governors together of the Bank of England, it had been found convenient to divide the pound troy decimally instead of, as formerly, into 5,760 grains. The hon. Member approved that change, but it was necessary to apply for an Act of Parliament, or the contracts made in pursuance of that alteration would have been illegal. The present Bill would give to every person in the country the same benefit as the Bank of England derived from their Act of Parliament. That, he thought, was an answer to his hon. Friend's objection.

Motion agreed to.

Clause struck out.

MR. W. EWART then proposed the following clause in lieu of it :—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in any Act of Parliament to the contrary, no contract or dealing shall be deemed to be invalid or open to objection on the ground that the weights or measures expressed or referred to in such contract or dealing are weights or measures of the metric system."

MR. HUBBARD said, that what the Bank of England did, was not to decimalize the pound troy, but to give a decimal expression to the divisions of the ounce. If the object of the clause was nothing more than to legalize voluntary arrangements between individuals for the use of the metric system, he would not object to it. But he wished to ask the right hon. President of the Board of Trade, whether people would be at liberty to make their entries at the Custom House in decimal expressions.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that in passing the measure of last Session the House undoubtedly gave its sanction to the introduction of the metric system into this country. His hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries had, however, agreed not to press the compulsory Bill, and to substitute a permissive one. He gave his vote for the second reading of the new Bill, on the understanding that he was not committed to all its provisions; but the clauses which his hon. Friend had now put on the papers exactly met his views on the subject. The first of the new clauses was simply to the effect that if a contract were expressed in the terms of the metric system, neither party should be allowed to escape from it upon the plea that it was expressed in terms not sanctioned by law. That got rid of the difficulty that by the existing law a contract in such terms as those proposed in the Bill was not deemed binding. The existing weights and measures would still form the legal standards in all cases in which the contracting parties had not of their own accord adopted the new system. On a former stage of the Bill the inquiry was very properly raised, what was a metre? That question was now answered by stating the relative relations between the metre and the English yard, and also generally between the metric weights and measures and the Imperial ones. There was thus no interference with any uniformity which now prevailed. The present lawful standards were left untouched, while facilities were given for the voluntary use of the metric system, which was rendered necessary by the great extent of our foreign trade. Of course, if a large number of persons were to insist on making their contracts in accordance with the metric system, there would be a considerable change in the existing practice; but no degree of compulsion would be used in the matter. Public feeling would be allowed to form itself freely on the subject. The Astronomer Royal had given a great deal of time and attention to the schedule, and it was submitted with his approbation. As to the question which had been asked in regard to the Customs, the use of the metric system would be entirely voluntary, and neither party to a transaction would be entitled to force the other to adopt the metric terms against his will.

New Clause agreed to :—

"3. The table in the schedule hereto annexed, shall be deemed to set forth, in terms of the legal weights and measures in force in this country, the equivalents of the weights and measures therein expressed in terms of the metric system, and such table may be lawfully used for computing, determining, and expressing, in legal weights and measures, weights and measures of the metric system."

Schedule of Tables of Equivalents.

MR. AYRTON urged that the calculations should be carried to the utmost possible point of scientific accuracy. Mr. Whitworth asserted that by a contrivance of his invention a measurement could be made of the millionth part of an inch; and making allowance for a certain degree of professional enthusiasm, he believed that the 100,000th part of an inch really could be measured. In the Schedule, however, the measures of length were carried to only four places of decimals, and this was also the case with the measures of surface. On the other hand, the weights were carried as low as the ten-millionth part of a dram. He thought that greater uniformity should have been observed in this respect in compiling the table, and that an effort should have been made to obtain the greatest exactitude.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would consider the point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

BILL—[BILL 115.]

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN HAY: Sir, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill I wish to say a few words in explanation, because when the Bill was introduced there was no opportunity of explaining fully the object it has in view. It cannot be said that legislation is unnecessary, because in the present Session two Bills have already been introduced to the notice of this House—one by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which he withdrew with a view at some future time to legislate more largely and comprehensively on the subject. The other Bill was introduced by three Members of this House, representing three of the large commercial constituencies of Scotland; and that measure was also withdrawn on the understanding that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would at an early period consider the whole subject, and bring in a comprehensive measure to meet the wants of Scotland in this particular. It must be known to this House that Scotland differs from England, there being no legal tender there except gold. In England, to avoid expense, the Bank of England is authorized to issue notes which are convertible into gold when presented at their establishments. Now, for the solvency of the Bank of England paper the whole kingdom stands pledged; and while Scotland and Ireland are pledged to this solvency, England alone has the benefit of the issue of the notes. The £14,000,000 which is guaranteed by the country is by the taxation of the whole kingdom. In fact, in times of great pressure the country has stepped in and has relieved the Bank by suspending cash payments to meet the notes payable on demand. As I have already stated, this has been done by pledging the credit of Scotland and Ireland as well as of England for the solvency of that establishment. It was only yesterday that the hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) intended to introduce the Bill of which he has given notice, to endeavour to extend to Ireland the privilege which this Bill contemplates extending to Scotland. Now, this was no narrow question, agitated by any particular individuals; but it is the general wish of the commercial classes, both of Ireland and Scotland, to derive the benefit which is afforded by the credit of the paper of the Bank of England, and in their transactions to avail themselves of the credit of that establishment to whose solvency they are pledged. Some gentlemen have doubted, whether it would be advantageous in the interest of free trade in banking, that the issue of Bank of England notes should be made a legal tender in other parts of the kingdom; but I venture to say that the monopoly in Scotland is already so stringent that the introduction of those notes to relieve the commercial classes from the monopoly of the present Scotch banks, would be found to be a great advantage to them. The reason why this measure has not been asked for has been, that the people have rested contented with the assurance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he would introduce a Bill upon the subject. At the present time, few new banks are opened in Scotland; and while commerce has largely increased, the number of banks has diminished. In 1844, I think, there were twenty-three banks in Scotland, and to them was guaranteed the power of issue upon their credit, without reference to the bullion they held, but in accordance with the amount of issue during the three years previous. Since that time, two of the banks have disappeared entirely from the scene, and others have amalgamated; so that, at this present moment, there are only fourteen banks in Scotland carrying on the business of banks, and they have concentrated in their hand the whole of the issue of the country. It is true that in addition to the fixed issue guaranteed, which was £3,000,000, and has now been reduced to £2,500,000, they have the power to issue against the gold which they hold; but the introduction of the Bank of England paper would relieve them from considerable pressure. Annually the banks, at certain periods, have to be inspected under the sanction of the Government, and they are to show that they are in possession of the amount of bullion to cover that issue which they have over and above their fixed issue. I am informed that early in this year considerable pressure existed in London, and that to satisfy the Government Inspector in Scotland, something like £1,500,000 was withdrawn from the Bank of England to be carried to Scotland, there to be exhibited against the issue; and having performed that duty was returned to the Bank of England. It seems to me that it would have been a far wiser and more satisfactory mode of procedure if these banks, instead of running the risk of removing bullion from London at a time when there was a tightness in the money market, had had it in their power to produce Bank of England paper as a certificate of their solvency, that their credit was good, and that gold was forthcoming if required to meet their calls. I would also add that I think there would be very great commercial convenience in extending the benefits of a uniform currency, generally recognized by all portions of the United Kingdom. I trust to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he is shortly about to extend this privilege to Scotland, and I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Hay.)

MR. FINLAY said, that in proposing that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, he would state in a very few words the reasons which had led him to take that course. The object of the Bill was to make the notes of the Bank of England a legal tender in Scotland, with especial powers to the Bank to establish branch establishments in Edinburgh and Glasgow. Now there was no law to prevent the people of Scotland from accepting the notes of the Bank of England at present if they choose to do so. These notes were, as far as that goes, exactly on the same footing as the Scotch notes. There was, therefore, no grievance to be redressed, nor any injustice to be removed. If this Bill passed into law, the people of Scotland would have no choice in the matter—they would be obliged to receive the notes whenever they were tendered, whether they wished it or not. Such a law would be in entire opposition to the fundamental principles upon which the issue of bank notes had always been carried on, and which he hoped would not be departed from—namely, that every creditor was entitled to demand the payment of debts due to him in the coin of the realm, and if he accepted Bank of England notes he did so for his own convenience and at his own risk and responsibility. They all knew that the Bank of England had no power to issue notes for smaller sums than £5, whereas the Scotch banks had the power to issue £1 notes. They should, therefore, have this anomaly—that the branches of the Bank of England in Glasgow and Edinburgh would be restricted to £5 notes, while their rivals next door would have the power of issuing £1 notes. Such an inconsistency could not long be allowed to exist. Further legislation would be necessary, and they would either have to allow the Bank of England in Scotland to issue £1 notes, or to prevent Scotch banks issuing notes under £5. It was not very likely that the Bank of England would issue £1 notes in Scotland, for if they did, then they would have to do it in England. If they did not do this, then they would have to adopt the other alternative and prohibit the Scotch banks from issuing £1 notes, and the excellent system of banking in Scotland would be destroyed. Besides it was not fair towards the Scotch people themselves to introduce such a Bill as this without giving them ample opportunity of considering its scope and tendency. There was another objection to the Bill. If it pass into law it would create a new and perhaps considerable demand for Bank of England notes. How was this to be met? The great complaint against the English Bank Act of 1844 was that it did not supply a sufficient number of notes in times of panic. Therefore, by creating new demands for notes, they would increase the evil, which had already led twice to the suspension of the Act. The fact was if the Bank of England note should be made a legal tender in Scotland, that House must be prepared to go into the whole currency question, and he submitted that this was not the time for bringing under the consideration of the House a measure of such vital importance and interest.

Sir John Hay

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Finlay.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. K. HODGSON thought that the question as regarded the circulation of the notes of the Bank of England in Scotland could only be treated as a great public question. He did not see how it would be possible to carry out this Bill, making the Bank of England notes a legal tender in Scotland without providing some place in Scotland where Bank of England notes could be exchanged, as they were done at the Bank of England and its branches. Now, that would be attended with considerable expense. The system of banking in Scotland and the system of banking in England were so widely different that it would be scarcely possible for the Bank of England to carry on banking business in Scotland in order to compensate them for the expense that this new issuing department would cause. Although it might be right that measures dealing with the circulation in Scotland and Ireland should be introduced, still he thought that this must form part of a great measure, which must deal with the whole banking system in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and that it would be quite impossible to consider the case of Scotland alone. He thought a great deal of weight ought to be attached to the objection that the Bank of England had no lower notes than £5, and that if it were to establish branch banks doing business in Edinburgh or Glasgow they would have to carry on their business in gold and in £5 notes, and that if they were to use £1 notes they could only do so through the issues of the other banks. That would be a great anomaly; and, under all the circumstances, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend would do well not to press the Bill on this occasion. It was part of a great measure; by itself it could not be worked to any great advantage, and he thought his hon. and gallant Friend would best consult the objects he had in view by withdrawing his Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE did not think that any great danger would be likely to arise from making Bank of England notes a legal tender in Scotland; nor did he believe that the anomaly which it would introduce would be greater than that which now existed—that £1 notes were allowed on one side of the Tweed and were not allowed on the other. But he thought there would be some difficulty in the way of introducing such a measure as that now proposed. When his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) brought forward his former Bill, he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) gave him his support, considering that the present system of banking in Scotland laboured under a defect which was not foreseen when the Bank Act of 1845 was passed, which it was for the Legislature to consider, and the duty of the Government to deal with. He agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend that they should use every effort to break down the monopoly which now existed, and to restore the system to something like the condition in which it existed before these unwise restrictions were placed upon it. The objections which had been taken were not so much to the currency as to the question of banking. The principle of the late Sir Robert Peel was to place restrictions upon the currency, but to leave banking perfectly free. In dealing with the question, however, Parliament acted on different principles with regard to Scotland and England. The effect of Sir Robert Peel's measures had been to lead to a large extension of the banking system in England, especially in London, but it had acted in an opposite direction in regard to Scotland. He could not say that any great evils had arisen from the restrictions now existing; but he could not regard the subject without alarm when he saw that the present banking system was like a Tontine proprietorship, and that on the failure or absorption of one of the banks the currency was taken up by another, which extended its branches to the different parts of the country. There was no doubt that, in the public opinion of the country, there practically existed an impediment in the way of the establishment of new banks. This system could not be safe or sound, and it was one which the Government should attempt to remedy. But the question was—Would the Bill before the House act in that direction? He was for free trade in banking; but he felt some alarm lest, if they allowed the Bank of England the privilege of establishing branch banks in Scotland, and if they were thus to get a share in the monopoly, they should turn round and act as an obstruction in the way of the change which was desired. The hon. Member for Bridport (Mr. K. Hodgson) had stated that, in consequence of the different banking systems which prevailed in Scotland and England, the issue of bank-notes in Scotland would not be a profitable business. That showed the extreme difficulty that would arise from the banks seeking to trade simply upon an extension of issues of Bank of England notes. They might, by depositing gold in the Bank of England, have a command of them; but all that they would gain by that would not be sufficient encouragement for them to do so. But if the Bank of England, by the establishment of branch banks in Edinburgh and Glasgow, entered on banking business in Scotland, they might become interested in the maintenance of the existing monopoly. It was desirable that the subject should be considered more largely than could be done by discussing the Bills introduced that Session, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would tell them what were his views, and that he would, if not this Session at least in the next, bring in some legislation on the subject. If he did not do so, he (Sir Edward Colebrooke), for one, would not consent to allow the question to rest, and should certainly press for inquiry into the operation of the system as it had hitherto existed.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he was sorry to have to oppose his hon. and gallant Friend, but the fact was that a great number of his constituents were excessively suspicious of the English sovereign, and they certainly would strongly object to have Bank of England notes forced upon them, instead of their own £1. He submitted that the people of Scotland should be allowed, as far as possible, to manage their own affairs; and he hoped that on the present occasion the Scotch Members would not be overridden by the tyranny of an English majority. Scotland was prepared to stand by its £1 notes, and there was no reason in the world why it should be obliged to accept English paper.

MR. DALGLISH said, he would be one of the last men to oppose any real improvement in the banking system of Scotland, but he protested against this constant meddling on the part of private Members who have no specific knowledge of the improvements required. If the Government would bring forward a measure to improve the Scotch banking system he should gladly give it his earnest and cordial support; but he objected to so important a question being constantly brought before the House for no other apparent object than to benefit certain Joint Stock Companies who wanted to establish themselves in Scotland. The hon. and gallant Member (Sir John Hay) has stated that the Government give their security to the Bank of England for their notes. But he (Mr. DalGLISH) was not aware that the Bank of England notes had any such security. The Bank of England had no guarantee for the excess of their circulation but the bullion in their cellars; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished the Scotch banks to hold Bank of England notes as the security for their excess. Now, although the people of Scotland were always very glad to get Bank of England notes, yet they would prefer gold as a security for the excess of their circulation, and he was sure their opinion was entirely adverse to the present Bill.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that as the hon. and gallant Gentleman had been good enough to show him this Bill, and to ask him if he saw any objection to it as connected with the Bank of England, and having stated that he saw no objection to Bank of England notes being made a legal tender in Scotland, he wished to state the reasons why he should vote for the Amendment. This Bill appeared to him to involve a new principle of legislation in banking, and he did not think that they were prepared to go into so wide a question at the present time. It was necessary to consider well before they arrived at the conclusion that Bank of England notes should be made a legal tender in Scotland. His hon. and gallant Friend complained, as he understood him, of a want of paper circulation in Scotland; but he begged to remind him that the banks in Scotland could issue their own notes provided they had gold to meet them in their banks. The Banks of Scotland could issue any quantity in exchange for gold. Why did they not do so? Because the expense was so great that it did not pay them to do so. It was an expensive operation to the Bank of England to issue notes; and the Scotch banks found that it was not profitable to do so. He thought, therefore, that it was too bad to ask the Bank of England to undertake what the Scotch banks found an unprofitable business. He trusted his hon. and gallant Friend would not press the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay) must feel from the discussion that has taken place that it is not agreeable to the House to proceed further with this Bill. I confess I am of opinion that there are various reasons why we are not in a position to do so. In the first place, a Bill of this sort cannot be proceeded with without concert with the Bank of England. It is an extraordinary proposal to give powers to the Bank of England without knowing that the Bank of England is prepared to exercise those powers; and to entail upon the Bank of England responsibilities of considerable importance without having obtained its assent beforehand. It is impossible to consider the question of making Bank of England notes a legal tender in Scotland apart from the question of the establishment of branches of the Bank of England in Scotland. We cannot consider that question without entering into an inquiry on the subject touched upon by my hon. Friend the Member for Argyleshire, as to the manner in which the Bank of England is to conduct not only its issuing business, but its banking business in Scotland. This is a consideration which I do not think falls within the view of the hon. and gallant Member. No doubt he contemplates the establishment of branches by the Bank of England, but he knows nothing of the willingness of the Bank of England to establish these branches. He is providing for matters in which he must have the assent of the Bank of England, without knowing that he will have the co-operation of that important body. The hon. and gallant Member seems to think that Scotland and Ireland, in common with England, guarantee the circulation of the Bank of England to the extent of, at all events, £14,000,000. That is an erroneous supposition altogether. There is no guarantee for the circulation of the Bank of England, or any part of it, by the State. The state of the case is this: that the Bank of England has lent the State £11,000,000, which stands in the form of a debt to that institution; and it has besides £3,000,000 invested in the public securities. The State is, therefore, a creditor to the Bank to the extent of £14,000,000; but surely the fact that the Bank has lent to the Government that sum does not afford any claim to Scotland or Ireland to make a demand upon the Bank of England. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Argyleshire that a measure of this kind would be viewed with the greatest suspicion in Scotland. Hitherto it has been the policy—and I think, under the circumstances, the wise policy—of the State to keep entirely apart the treatment of the subject of circulation in the three kingdoms. I believe with my hon. Friend that to force the Bank of England notes on Scotland would be greatly resented—partly by the existing Scotch banks, and to a very great extent by the people of Scotland. There is a great deal of national sentiment still remaining in Scotland. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Andrew Agnew) expressed a hope that in this matter Scotch Members will not be overridden by an English majority. I am quite certain that the Scotch Members, although they may not be very numerous, yet backed by the opinion of the people of Scotland, are perfectly well able to take care of themselves; and the last thing which we will see is the representatives of Scotland overridden by a tyrannical English majority in the matter of their small note circulation. Now, apart from this there is, in my opinion, this objection to the measure. It is a measure which belongs to a state of things entirely different and very remote from the state of things which now exists. You cannot possibly combine a system of legislation with respect to the circulation of the three countries in the present state in which the circulation exists. It is needless to enter into the question whether, abstractedly, that would not be desirable. I think it would be most desirable to have a uniform system throughout the three kingdoms; but, looking at the state of affairs which exists in Ireland with regard to the currency, and also to the system which prevails in Scotland, I must say that I consider the realization of any scheme at present for a uniformity of currency in the three countries as altogether impracticable, or at any rate remote. The proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet seems to me to presume that we have already arrived at a point in our currency legislation little short of absolute uniformity. If there is to be a note which is to circulate in Scotland and Ireland, it ought to be a note proceeding from some authority which stands in direct relation to the people of Scotland. But the Bank of England is an institution which is absolutely and entirely English; it has no relation to the people of Ireland or of Scotland, and I do not know how we could consistently establish a system of uniformity of tender unless that legal tender rested on the authority and guarantee of the common Legislature. In my opinion we are still remote from that state of things in which a national issue could be the rule of currency in this country. I do not at all recede from the opinions which I ventured to state on a former occasion in reference to the law relating to banking in Scotland—namely, that some amendment is required. But I admit that there is a speciality in the case of Scotland arising from the usages of the people, and the conditions upon which banking is carried on there. I should not, therefore, think it wise or safe to presume to give any authoritative pledge as to the time or the mode in which it would be right to attempt legislation on the subject. All I will say is, that I consider it the duty of the Government of the country to look for a suitable opportunity for such legislation; but, on the other hand, I think it is the bounden duty of the Government not to attempt legislation of a comprehensive character on a subject so difficult and so important, except at such a period and under such circumstances as would afford a reasonable hope that the proposals they made were likely to meet with the assent of Parliament. There is much to bear in mind with regard to the relations of the three countries, and the time of bringing such a matter under the notice of the House, which must be thoroughly digested and matured before any decision is arrived at. I think the House is not called upon to arrive at such an abstract decision as that which is involved in the Motion of the hon. and gallant Baronet. At the same time, it would be utterly futile at the present period of the Session to pretend to deal with questions affecting the national currency, or the uniformity of a paper currency throughout the three kingdoms. Those are questions which, at this moment, the House would be wholly incapable of entertaining with the slightest prospect of advantage. Let us be content to proceed in a question of this kind step by step, and not to deal with it as one of abstract principles, but rather with a due regard to the practical wants of the three countries. Further improvements may doubtless be made in the law which regulates the state of banking and currency, but they should be introduced cautiously and circumspectly, and not by a measure premature in its character, and which, if adopted by this House, would be productive of great inconvenience.

Mr. HUBBARD said, the right hon. Gentleman had not alluded to the circumstances which fully justified the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield in introducing this subject to the notice of the House—namely, that, notwithstanding the very great progress in Scotland in wealth, there had been no new banks established; while in England they had multiplied to an extent hitherto unknown and unprecedented. In point of fact, in Scotland there had been an absolute diminution in the number of those institutions. Was it right that the banking facilities afforded in Scotland should be confined to the number of existing banks, which had among themselves an absolute monopoly? It was as a free trader opposed to monopoly that he joined in asking for Scotland the same avenues for the use of capital which existed in England. The hon. and gallant Member did not ask to share with the existing institutions the power of issue they now possess—that would be properly refused by the Government—but he asked simply for the power of existence. He tells you that he could not open a bank in Scotland without having some means of currency. He must use either gold or notes. If he issues gold, according to the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) the people of Scotland hate sovereigns to such an extent that they will not take them. Then how was the hon. and gallant Member to work his bank? He must issue notes. And whose notes is he to issue? They must be the notes of the existing banks—of his own rivals, in fact; and every time he undertakes a commercial transaction he must advertise his rivals in trade. The hon. and gallant Member simply asked that a new banking establishment should be released from the liability of advertising its rivals, and should be enabled to supply notes of the Bank of England. He asked no more than that he should be provided with Bank of England notes. At present, Bank of England notes in Scotland were not a legal tender; but Parliament can make them so. The objection which his hon. Friend the present Governor of the Bank of England (Mr. Hodgson) entertained to that course was that by such an issue the Bank of England would have to incur considerable expense. It was perfectly true that they would have to incur considerable expense, for which they would get no equivalent if they issued against bullion; but by allowing the Bank to issue for Scotland against securities a remuneration would be provided to the Bank, while the net profit of the issue would be received by the State. The object of the present Bill was simply to constitute Bank of England notes a legal tender; but surely the moderation of the demand ought not to be a reason for rejecting it. If a bank in Scotland is satisfied to take Bank of England notes, the demand is so moderate that, taken by itself, one would be puzzled to find a reason for refusing it. Having now said so much in justification of his hon. and gallant Friend's measure, he would not advise him to press his Motion to a division against an unwilling Government. No such measure could be satisfactorily introduced without the cordial assent of the Government, and it would be impossible to carry such an operation out without the assistance of Government. There was a great contrast between the existing state of things in England and in Scotland with regard to banking, but it was not so much with regard to the system of banking as to the currency. The whole subject was well deserving of the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he trusted the day was not far distant when there would be one uniform Imperial currency.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN observed, that having taken a great interest in the subject, he had given notice of a Motion for the introduction of a Bill to render bank notes a legal tender in Ireland, as the hon. and gallant Member opposite proposed to do in regard to Scotland. He was disappointed at the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), because he seemed to hold out no hopes that the principle on which this Bill was based would be accepted in another Session. Still he thought that this discussion would not be without some good, as it would tend to facilitate the introduction of some general scheme of banking whenever the Chancellor of the Exchequer should turn his attention to the subject. He did not think that the real question before the House was a question of currency at all. It did not in the slightest degree affect the issue of £1 notes. It would be just as well to say that making sovereigns a legal tender in England or Ireland would affect the question of making £1 notes a legal tender. There ought to be some note which should be a legal tender in Scotland; and as a £5 Bank of England note was a legal tender in England, he did not see why that should not be adopted in Scotland, so that there may be as great uniformity as possible between the three countries. Great stress was laid upon the objection that the establishment of such a system in Scotland would necessitate the institution of branch banks in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other places. He could not see the force of that argument. For instance, years ago London was much further from Cornwall than it is now from Edinburgh, and yet there had been no difficulty in rendering the tender of a £5 note legal in Cornwall, notwithstanding there was no branch bank there. If Bank of England notes were not made a legal tender in Scotland, he was afraid that the banking business in that country would become an absolute monopoly. At this moment there were only twelve banks in Scotland, while in England there were more than 100 joint-stock banks, and above 300 private banks. He believed that during the present year the Scotch banks had issued notes to the extent of £1,172,000 in excess, and therefore they had none to give to any new banks that might be started; whereas, if Bank of England notes were a legal tender, they could readily get them from the Bank of England. It was not proposed that the Bank of England should be compelled to give notes; the Bill was simply permissive. At present the Bank of England note could not be used in Scotland without paying a percentage; and that would be done away with if they were made a legal tender. Upon account of the convenience, he thought the Government ought to render its assistance towards putting down the monopoly which at present existed.

MR. BLACK: Sir, we are certainly greatly indebted for the sympathy and compassion which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hubbard) has displayed towards poor Scotland. He states that we are suffering under such a monopoly that, even supposing he were to bring gold into the country, it would be impossible for him to obtain as many notes in exchange for it as would be required. Now, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if he will only bring proper security, or bring the gold, he will find it a very easy matter on our part to print as many notes as he may desire. The hon. Member has also stated that there has been a great progress in the population and wealth of Scotland, and that it has not been met by the currency, which ought to have gone hand in hand with it. Now, what has been one great cause of the prosperity of Scotland? In my opinion it has been these very banks, and the machinery upon which those banks have carried on their business. They have done more than anything else I know of to promote the prosperity of Scotland. And the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) tells us that at present there is an entire monopoly in the banking system of Scotland, and that there are only in existence some thirteen banks. Now, if he would allow me to correct him, there are upwards of 600 banks in Scotland. I do not know that there is any country in the world so well supplied with banks. In every village where there are not more perhaps than 1,000 inhabitants, you will find one or two banks. I gave the House some time ago a calculation of the number of banks which we possess in Scotland in proportion to the population, and in proportion to the value of property, and I believe we have nine or ten times as many banks for the population as there are either in England or Ireland. In such a town as Inverary, for example, where there are not more than 1,000 inhabitants, there are two banks, and the competition between those banks is quite as keen as between any of the banks on the joint-stock principle in England. In point of fact, I do not believe that any country in the world is so well supplied with banks as Scotland is at the present moment. What is it that is sought to be enacted by this Bill? It proposes that the Bank of England notes shall be made a legal tender. But the hon. and gallant Baronet has not told us whether the people of Scotland desire to have these Bank of England notes imposed upon them at all. In my opinion they are perfectly satisfied with the notes they now have; and I believe if Scotland were polled all over it would be found that they would far sooner take the notes of the banks of Scotland than those of the Bank of England. And even the Bank of England has no desire for a change. Surely, then, if neither the people of Scotland nor the Bank of England desire a change, why should this Bill be introduced? If the object of the Bill is to make Bank of England notes a legal tender all over Scotland, why should not the same privileges be given to the Glasgow and Edinburgh banks? Why should they not have the power of opening branches in England in order to assist their issue? Why, at any rate, should the privilege of opening branches of English banks be confined to Glasgow and Edinburgh? Why should they not be allowed to open branches anywhere? I believe the question to be so important that it is entirely futile to suppose that we could legislate upon it this Session, and I therefore join in the appeal which has been made to the hon. and gallant Member to withdraw his Bill.

MR. PEACOCKE said, the question raised by the Bill was not an abstract but a practical one. The simple proposition was that Bank of England notes should be made a legal tender in a country where it might fairly be said there was no forced circulation except bullion. There was an opposition to the Bill on the part of twelve Scotch banks which objected to having their monopoly broken in upon; but the general mercantile community of Scotland desired to have some such measure as that passed; and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman pressed his Motion to a division he should certainly vote with him. It was said that it would be a hardship to make people in Scotland accept these notes, and that it would be impossible for the £5 Bank of England notes to circulate side by side with the £1 notes of Scotland; but how, he asked, could the one description of notes displace the other?

MR. GOSCHEN thought, that simple as might be the proposal to establish Bank of England notes as a legal tender in Scotland, the House ought to be very careful before adopting it. The object of the Bill was to compel the people of Scotland to take a description of notes which it was said they did not want; and it appeared that those who took them would be obliged to incur the expense of sending them up to London to be exchanged for gold.

MAJOR HAMILTON said, that one of the reasons why the people of Scotland did not care to have Bank of England notes forced upon them was that they held their own notes to be as good, if not better. When the Western Bank of Scotland failed, its notes were as good on the day of the failure as they were the day before. The people of Scotland do not care to have

Bank of England notes forced upon them. Whenever a person presents a Bank of England note to be cashed at a small village, he is asked to write his name across the back of it. The probable reason is that the people of Scotland, however good the Bank of England notes may be in England, are rather alarmed at having such a document placed in their hands in Scotland. I should like to know whether any gentleman was ever asked to write his name over a £5 note issued in Scotland.

MR. BAXTER thought the hon. and gallant Member opposite would do well to rest satisfied with the discussion that had taken place, which had been very much in favour of the principle of his Bill. The speech of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) would give the impression that the Scotch system of banking was perfect, and could not possibly be altered for the better; but every one who was well acquainted with the subject was perfectly aware that the law relating to it was extremely defective, and must sooner or later be amended. But as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had held out the prospect that probably next Session there would be a revision of the whole system, and had guarded himself against expressing an opinion hostile to the principle of the present Bill, it was not advisable to press the matter any further on that occasion.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he had not heard a word in that discussion to show that there would be any impropriety in extending to Scotland and Ireland the privilege which England had enjoyed for the last thirty years.

SIR JOHN HAY believed that it would be unwise, after the appeals which had been made to him, and considering the period of the Session, if he were now to go to a division. At the same time he thought that the discussion which had taken place, and the interest displayed in the subject, fully justified him in introducing the question to the notice of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that in his opinion it was desirable that any change should be made step by step. He sincerely trusted that the discussion which had now taken place would be one step towards the change, which the majority of the people of Scotland desired to see. He hoped that early next Session the Chancellor of the Exchequer would bring in a Bill to give to Scotland and other parts of the United Kingdom those privileges in connection with banking of which they are now deprived. He would now, with the leave of the House, withdraw the Bill.

Amendment, and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

JERSEY COURT BILL—[BILL 48.]

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. LOCKE: Sir, before you leave the chair, I wish to make one or two observations with regard to this Bill. It will be in the recollection of some Members of the House that the second reading took place a considerable time since, and the Bill has been postponed from time to time until at length we have arrived at the stage when the House is asked to go into Committee upon it. The reason why I am anxious to make some observations on the matter is this, that the state of opinion in the Island of Jersey has undergone a very great change since I first introduced the Bill to the notice of the House. The Bill, as I stated on a former occasion, is similar to the one which was introduced into this House in the year 1861. Indeed that Bill, which was introduced by Mr. Serjeant Pigott, was precisely the same as the Bill which is now before the House for its consideration in Committee. It was founded upon the Report of the Commission which sat in 1859 and 1860, and which was composed of Sir John Awdry, the right hon. the Earl of Devon and Richard Jebb, Esq. They were the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the civil laws of Jersey, and their Report, with appendix, was presented to both Houses of Parliament in the year 1860. Now, in the year 1861, Mr. Serjeant Pigott introduced his Bill into this House. The Government of that day, Sir George Cornwall Lewis being at the head of the Home Department, entirely approved of the provisions of the Bill; and, in point of fact, the Bill, as I have stated, was entirely founded upon the Report of the Commission. But Sir George Cornwall Lewis at that time stated that it was inexpedient for Mr. Serjeant Pigott to go on with the Bill, as the States of Jersey had not had a sufficient opportunity of considering the recommendations of the Commissioners, and he was anxious that they should be submitted to their consideration with a view that they might themselves legislate upon the subject. Therefore it was that Mr. Serjeant Pigott withdrew the Bill in the year 1861, which I have had the honour of re-introducing in the present Session. Now, it is needless for me to go into the complaints that have from time to time been made by persons resident in the Island of Jersey of the mal-administration of the laws of that Island in consequence of the Royal Court of Jersey not performing the duties of a Court in the way in which we, at this time of day, expect that a Court should perform them. It is quite sufficient to refer to the Report in which the Royal Commissioners stated numerous objections to this Court; in point of fact, they condemned it altogether, and made suggestions which have been embodied in this Bill. I will just call the attention of the House to some of the statements in the Report of the Royal Commissioners. They say that whatever may have been in earlier times the merits of this very ancient tribunal, the constitution of which they had discussed, it was their deliberate conviction that the Island, with its great wealth and population, its large foreign commerce, and all the important and complicated interests which have arisen in it, has at the present day so completely outgrown its judicature, that any reforms which shall leave the duties of the Superior Court in the hands of a numerous body without professional education, whose attendance is precarious, and for whose nomination no one is responsible to public opinion, will be absolutely nugatory. They, likewise, state that it appeared to them that it was essential that the Royal Court should in future consist of a small number of Judges of competent legal attainments and experience, with salaries sufficient to give the public a right to demand their punctual attendance, and nominated, during good behaviour, by some authority responsible for the propriety of the selection. They proposed, therefore, that the number should be three—namely, the Bailiff and two puisne Judges, to be nominated by the Crown, and to hold office during good behaviour. The Commissioners added that they should receive salaries of £1,200, £1,000, and £1,000 respectively; all Court fees of every description being paid, as soon as the necessary arrangements could be made, into a common fee fund. They further stated that they saw no advantage in continuing the Crown Officers as essential members of the Court, and recommended that one Judge should sit alone for duties which would be in the main similar to those to which the nombre inférieur is now competent, so far as such duties might be retained, whilst there would be less frequent but stated and calculable sittings of the Full Court. These are the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, and that is all, in point of fact, that this Bill pretends to effect. It having been shown most clearly by the Commissioners of 1859, that without a reform of the Royal Court of Jersey no good could be expected from any other reforms that might be made, it was, therefore, thought right that this object should, if possible, be attained—that they should go at once to the root of the evil which exists there—namely, to reform that Court, and give a tribunal to the Island which would be effective. It has been asserted by some that the inhabitants of Jersey are a peculiar race of people, that they conquered this country, and have a right to go on precisely as they please. They entirely forget that a very large proportion of the inhabitants of that Island are at the present moment English people, and that whatever, as the Commissioners say, might have been the merits of their very ancient tribunal in former times, they are now discontented with the system under which twelve Jurats are elected by simple ratepayers, the only qualification for the office being that they shall possess a sum of £30 a year, and shall not be butcher or baker, or belong to some other one or two trades. That being the only qualification for the Judges of the land, English persons and the great bulk of the Jersey people are entirely discontented with the system, because they say, very truly, that it is perfectly monstrous that these men without the necessary knowledge of law—and nobody knows whether they ever had any—should have the power of pronouncing decisions in that Court, simply because the Bailiff was a lawyer. But that functionary does not direct the Court. He does not say what is the law, and leaves it to the jury to decide upon the fact. These Jurats are the Judges both of law and fact, and when a question of law has to be decided, they put it to the vote, and the Bailiff has no more power or authority than any one of the Jurats of the Court. Now, this has been found to act in the most inconvenient manner. One great objection is, that when evidence is taken in a case, it is necessary to have the same Jurats every time the Court meets, in order that the business may proceed; but in addition to their being Jurats, they likewise are members of the States, and they have, in point of fact, thrust upon them such numerous duties, that it is utterly impossible that they can attend to their judicial functions. The consequence is, that they are neglected, and great injustice is thereby done to the people in the Island of Jersey. Now, as I stated, the inhabitants of Jersey are a very peculiar people, and they arrogate to themselves a position higher, I believe, than that of anybody in this country. They say that they conquered us, but they entirely forget that Henry the First conquered them again. I do not however think it is worth while to go into these ancient matters. The question is, what is necessary to be done at the present time of day? What is necessary for the comfort and the security of the life and property of the inhabitants of the Island of Jersey? And, moreover, what is necessary for the interests of those who are trading with them, and having communication with them every day? In former times there was a very small population in the Island of Jersey. At the present time there are no less than 60,000 inhabitants, or nearly so, and a great portion of these are English. It appears by the last census what are the precise numbers of each description of individuals in that Island. In addition to that, they own 50,000 tons of shipping. There are most important questions coming under the notice of the Royal Court from day to day; and how have these questions to be decided? They have to be decided by these twelve men, called Jurats, who do not necessarily know anything about the law, and, I believe, the only appeal there is is to the Privy Council, and that, I think, cannot be in regard to any matter under £200. Therefore, the condition in which the people of Jersey find themselves is certainly not one that anybody else would envy. They do not themselves now envy it. They have always had a strong desire to legislate for themselves. They certainly have had a strong jealousy of any legislation with respect to the Island being undertaken by the Imperial Parliament, and the desire of those who were anxious for reform was, that whatever could be done in that direction should be done by the Queen in Council; and very early in this year a petition was forwarded to the Queen in Council, signed by many of the most respectable persons in Jersey, and holding high positions, praying for a reform of the laws of Jersey, and asking for the very reform which is contained in this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department presented that address. The Return which was moved for by an hon. Member of this House of the correspondence which passed between the States of Jersey and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, has been presented to the House, and I would recommend those Returns to the attention of hon. Members. I will only say that they show on the part of the Home Secretary the strongest desire that the States of Jersey should legislate for themselves, and he points out to them what is necessary. On the other hand, I think, it appears from that correspondence, that the States of Jersey set themselves entirely against any reform whatever. But beyond that, I have been supplied from time to time with the Jersey papers containing accounts of the debates which have taken place in the States with reference to the Bill now before the House, and with the exception of some five or six of the representatives, who have shown themselves anxious for, and made a motion in the States with regard to, that reform which is contained in the Bill, the States have shown that they set themselves entirely against it, and that they are determined not to have any reform whatever. It was only lately that a proposal was made in the States to separate the judicial and legislative powers vested in the Jurats, and it was negatived by an immense majority. In point of fact, they would not take it into consideration; and, therefore, hon. Members will see that it is impossible to expect that the States of Jersey will make any attempt at all for the reformation of the Royal Court and of the laws of the Island. At all events, that is the opinion to which a vast portion of the inhabitants of Jersey have at last come. As I stated, they are extremely reluctant that Great Britain should legislate for them, and they sent up a petition to the Queen in Council, asking her to do that which is embodied in the Bill, and many signed that petition who are now ready to sign this, and some of them have done it. There was a strong feeling against the interference of this House, but that feeling has since then been changed. I presented yesterday to this House two petitions from inhabitants of Jersey, to which were attached no less than 3,900 signatures. That was a greater number than was obtained by the States even for the petitions presented against the Bill, and notwithstanding that intimidation of every kind has been used by the persons in authority in Jersey to prevent the people from petitioning this House in favour of the Bill. But in spite of all that, no less than 3,900 signatures have been appended to the petition which I presented yesterday, stating what their grievances were under the present system, and asking this House to pass this Bill to relieve them from the state in which the Royal Court of Jersey has placed them. I think that is a most remarkable circumstance—that the Jersey people, feeling as they do a disinclination to come to this House, because they say they have always been separated from the Imperial Parliament, yet so strongly do they feel the state in which they are placed by reason of the mal-administration of the laws of Jersey through the Royal Court, that they have cast aside scruples on this subject, and have, to the large number of 3,900, petitioned the House to pass this Bill. I think, therefore, that this Bill comes before the House supported by the people of Jersey. They ask for reform; and I feel satisfied of this, that no technical objections which may be taken—none of that old and antiquated feeling—those notions which might have been entertained in former days—will be allowed to weigh with this House, and induce it to reject this Bill. Such being the state of things, just let us consider what ground there can be for refusing to pass the Bill. My hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Rolt) has put a notice on the paper that he intends to move that the States of Jersey be heard by their counsel, and to adduce evidence at the Bar of the House in opposition to the Bill. I suppose he will contend that Parliament cannot legislate for the Island of Jersey. Perhaps he will hardly say that, but that it is unconstitutional for Parliament to do so. Parliament has however, over and over again, legislated for the Island of Jersey. Parliament in the year 1805, upon the Smugglers Act, legislated for the Island of Jersey, and precisely the same objection which my hon. Friend says he is going to make on the present occasion was made then. It was, however, overruled both in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords, the Bill passed, and I believe it is the law of the land at the present moment. I know my hon. and learned Friend's ingenuity and power, but he cannot erase that Act of Parliament from the statute-book; nor can he get rid of the report in Hansard in the year 1805, when the same objection was made and entirely overruled. Well now, upon what grounds will the House refuse to legislate for the Island of Jersey? These persons forming the Court choose to adopt a certain course and say, "Oh, we may do as we like with our own." But has not every Englishman, Irishman, and Scotchman a right to go to Jersey? Do they not go in large numbers to Jersey? Is not a great proportion of the population of Jersey either English, Irish, or Scotch; and do they not tend very much to the wealth and advantage of that Island? Well, are they to submit to be governed by those barbarous laws? Are they to submit to have a tribunal like that in Jersey which, as I understand, makes a distinction between Jerseymen and other people, which exercises an influence which no Judge in any other land has a right to exercise? They have no right to be armed as legislators of the States and likewise as Judges. They perform all these duties together in this small Island, where everybody is at their beck and call, and instead of their duties being separated, they are all mixed up together, so that it is utterly impossible to make them attend to any of them properly. At all events, they have no time to perform their duties as Judges. But now it is a somewhat remarkable fact that many of these very men, these Jurats, who, before they were Jurats, thought rightly and thought properly, on becoming Jurats seem to have taken leave of their senses. I may also mention one hon. Gentleman, named Mr. Francis Godfray, who has been sent by the States to this country to stir up hon. Members in this House, and to induce them to oppose this Bill; what did he do? When he was examined before the Royal Commissioners, a gentleman writes me a letter to tell me what occurred. The gentleman who writes this letter says that although he cannot sign a petition to the House of Commons in favour of the Bill, for he does not like the interference of the British Parliament in the affairs of the Island of Jersey, still he cannot allow Mr. Godfray, who has come over to England for the purpose of inducing people to oppose this Bill, to do this without telling what occurred when he was examined before the Commissioners. And about this there is no question. The letter which this gentleman has addressed to me is dated the 6th of May in the present year, and he says he is opposed to any interference of the British Parliament, but still when a public man, such as Mr. Godfray is, becomes inconsistent, he considers it to be his duty to expose that person, especially when such a man is a member of the States, and one of the deputies appointed to the British Parliament to induce them not to pass this Bill. The Commissioners sat in 1846, and the proceedings were published in 1847. It was an inquiry into the state of the criminal law of the Channel Islands, and in pages 211 to 214 of the Report it will be found that when Mr. Godfray was examined, he then said he was in favour of reforming the constitution of the present Royal Court. In reply to one question he said, "I am decidedly of opinion that the Court is badly constituted," and having explained to the Commissioners the evils of the present system, Mr. Godfray says—

"I proposed a change in the institutions of the Island. I proposed, with the concurrence of the majority of the States, to do away with the twelve Jurats, and replace them by two Judges, elected by the people, but that these two Judges must be qualified, as having been lawyers of long practice. That was the principal feature of the change."

Now this was the change Mr. Godfray then proposed, and that is substantially what is now proposed to be done by this Bill. The only difference is that he says the two Judges were to be elected by the people and were to be of long standing and practice. He proposed that the twelve Jurats were to be done away with, and so does this Bill. The fact is this Bill and Mr. Francis Godfray's former opinions entirely coincide. I have here in my hand a host of opinions which were expressed by Jersey lawyers at that time against the system, and setting out what changes ought to be made, but I will not trouble the House with them. I think when I have mentioned Mr. Godfray, who is sent over by the States as their deputy and agent for the purpose of preventing this Bill passing, I do not think I could instance a better person than he is. Mr. Godfray has come over here to do what I have stated, and he is a member of the States, and expresses their opinions. I have stated the Report which the Commissioners came to, and the recommendations which they make. They were extremely simple, and they recommended that this should form the basis of the alteration of the Court of Jersey, and I have not heard anybody state that they have an objection to this Bill, with the exception of the hon. Member for Harwich (Captain Jervis). He has certainly put a Motion on the paper, and objects to the form of the Bill and the enactments in it, while the objection which the hon. Member for Gloucestershire makes is, that the House ought not to legislate upon the subject. But it is admitted that the House has the power, if it pleases, to legislate; and, as to the Bill itself, that it is a right measure, and that it is an improved and proper one, and that these Jurats shall not be allowed to exist any longer. I have only heard one single exception to the Bill itself, and that is, as I have already stated, the Amendment of which the hon. Member for Harwich has given notice. His proposal is to strike out Clause 15. Now, if you strike that clause out, you will find you will not have any money to pay the Judges, and he thinks that without money to pay the Judges, in all probability there will be none. And that is a sailor-like way of looking at the thing, and no doubt a very sensible one; but still at the same time, when we get into Committee on the Bill, I think I shall be able to meet that difficulty, and to accommodate the hon. Member for Harwich. But let us go into Committee on the Bill. Do not let us be led away. I trust the House will not be led away by any sophistry, causing them to suppose that they have no power to legislate. It is admitted on all hands we have the right and power, and have exercised that power before on numerous occasions. As well might it be said that the writ of Habeas Corpus does not extend to the Channel Islands, because they once did think that they could seize British subjects, and do as they pleased with them. But the Courts of Law settled that matter, and I trust this House will settle this matter, and will not allow the States of Jersey, who are ruling over English subjects as well as their own, to say they will uphold a Court like this. Two Commissions, of 1846 and of 1859, both treated it entirely as a nuisance which ought to be abated; and I trust the House, whatever my learned Friend urges on this matter, will be true to itself, and extend to Jersey those privileges which we enjoy, namely, a proper code of laws and a proper court of justice.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Locke.)

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I stated yesterday in answer to a Question put to me, that I would to-day intimate the course which the Government thought ought to be taken in regard to this Bill. The House will recollect that upon the second reading I expressed my entire concurrence in the object which this Bill sought to attain—the reformation of the Royal Court of Jersey. I stated that the Report of the Royal Commission had shown that there are great defects in the administration of justice in Jersey, arising out of the constitution and forms of procedure in that Court, and that the Commissioners had pointed out those reforms which they thought essential to the due administration of justice in Jersey. But I said at the same time that so long as there was any hope that these reforms would be carried into effect by the States of Jersey themselves, it was inexpedient that Parliament should interfere. A Bill was brought in by the present Mr. Baron Pigott; but it was objected to on the ground that the Report of the Royal Commission had been so short a time before the States that it was desirable to give them ample time to consider the reforms which it pointed out. On that occasion the right of Parliament to interfere was most distinctly affirmed. There can be no doubt that Parliament can interfere in case these reforms cannot be carried into effect in any other manner. The correspondence which has been laid on the table since the Bill was introduced, will show how the matter at present stands. The States in their last communication have declined to entertain the questions referred to them by the Lieutenant Governor. They have done so on the ground that to proceed to take into consideration the suggestions of the Commission and the recommendations of the Lieutenant Governor while this Bill was pending, would imply that they are acting under the coercion which might be supposed to be placed upon them by this measure. In answer to that, I informed them that if it was really intended to take up this question, and that if this Bill was the only obstacle to an entering into the consideration of these reforms—that, if this Bill was withdrawn and legislation by Parliament postponed, they really resolved to carry out themselves the suggestions made to them by the Commission—I should be sorry by further supporting this measure to put any obstacles in the way of their considering these questions. I have had no answer to that communication. But, at the same time, I think it desirable to proceed in this matter with due care and deliberation, and that we should still even avoid the semblance of depriving the States of Jersey of dealing with their own institutions, and of carrying the reforms suggested into effect, if they should see fit to do so. Under these circumstances, and in the spirit of my letter to the Lieutenant Governor, I express my hope—and I trust the House will agree with me in the expediency of that course—that my hon. Friend will not proceed with the Bill in the present Session. As I have already stated, I think Parliament has a perfect right to interfere; and if, during the interval, those reforms which are essential to the administration of justice in Jersey are not carried into effect, I do not think the Government can offer any obstacle during a future Session to the progress of a Bill of this kind. I do not mean to say that the Government approves of the Bill in all its details, but of a Bill the object of which is the reformation of the Royal Court of Jersey. I believe that there is a growing feeling in the Island itself not only in favour of these reforms, but in favour of the intervention of Parliament to give them effect—owing to the indisposition of the States to undertake them. I cannot help thinking that with the pressure put upon the States by the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, and by the growing opinion in Jersey in favour of these reforms, they will hardly place themselves in opposition to public opinion, and refuse to act upon the suggestions which have been addressed to them. In their last communication I understand them to say they are not opposed to these recommendations, and are not disposed to object to the views which are entertained by the Government. Under these circumstances, I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will not press the Bill, and that it will not be necessary for the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Paull) to make his Motion. I trust that the result will be that this alleged obstacle to the consideration of these reforms being removed, the States will fairly undertake the consideration of the recommendations of the Commissioners and the Lieutenant Governor, and that before another Session some Act will have been passed which will carry into effect the reforms so much desired.

MR. ROEBUCK hoped his hon. and learned Friend would withdraw the Bill, but on the distinct understanding that it was the opinion of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State that that House had full right and power to interfere in the affairs of Jersey, and that if something was not done by the States before the beginning of next Session he would, should he be in office, be prepared to lay on the table a Bill for reforming the Royal Court.

MR. PAULL: I have undertaken to make the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt) who is unable to be present, and the reason why he intended to submit that Motion was that the States of Jersey are entirely misrepresented in this matter. The statement which was made by my hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Locke) as to the appointment of the Commission, and the proceedings which took place under that Commission, is perfectly correct. The States are quite willing to consider these recommendations, but they are not willing that the Royal Court, which has existed for so many hundred years, should be abolished entirely in the way which it is now proposed to do. They protest against a question of this kind being taken up by any private Member of Parliament. They find that, although the Royal Commission was issued at the recommendation of the Government, and that these Commissioners have visited the Islands, and have received information from those most competent to judge, the question has not been taken up by Government as might reasonably have been expected, and as I think the House will say they ought to have done. If pressure is indirectly to be brought on the Island of Jersey—if the Government are content to leave a measure which they are disposed to support in the hands of a private Member—if, under these circumstances, the authorities of the Island, who ought to be represented in this House by the Government, are left to be bandied about the lobby, to take up their position in some hotel and to issue circulars to endeavour to secure the attention of Members of Parliament to their views, I say that nothing can be more unfitting and impolitic than that an Island which is not a conquered country, but is one of the most ancient and loyal dependencies of the British Crown, should be treated in this manner. For ages, peace, loyalty, and harmony have existed there, more, perhaps, than in any other portion of the British dominions. They have long enjoyed a distinct judicature and a distinct legislature. In every case in which Bills of Parliament have been passed for England and extending to Jersey, that legislation has not taken effect immediately in these Islands. The Acts have been referred to the Legislature of Jersey, and have been, in some instances with Amendments, registered, and have thereby become the law of the Island. The long address which has been delivered by my hon. and learned Friend precludes me from going into this case as I would wish to do. But I may say that the people of Jersey do not desire this Bill to be withdrawn. They join issue with the hon. and learned Gentleman, and they rely on making their case good before the House. They say that they are still ready to make reforms and to receive the recommendations of the Imperial Government; but they are not disposed to submit to allow their internal and domestic institutions to be dealt with in the way that this Bill proposes to deal with them. You are proposing by this Bill to appoint paid Judges and to dispose of taxation, which you are not empowered to deal with. I think the House will be of opinion that when the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) talks of great care and deliberation, there has been a great want of care and deliberation on the part of the Home Office. It is greatly owing to him that matters have been brought to their present position, and that the Gentlemen representing these Islands have been obliged to attend here from day to day. They only knew of the second reading of this Bill in time to be here the day before it came on; and consequently they were not able to organize an opposition. They received no such assistance and protection as they might have expected from the Home Office; and have had to go from one Member to another. They have retained an eminent counsel to appear before the House, and they are perfectly prepared to join issue with the hon. Gentleman. I myself have no interest in the matter, nor do I know all the merits of the case; but feeling that Parliament has no right to deal in this off-hand manner with institutions that have existed so long, I myself should be disposed to protest against the withdrawal of the Bill, and to insist that the States should be heard by their Counsel at the Bar of this House, and should have an opportunity of refuting the allegations which have been made against them so recklessly by the hon. and learned Gentleman. I know that at this period of the Session it will be extremely difficult to find a day on which the House could hear the counsel of the States at the Bar, and certainly that is the only ground on which I could agree to the withdrawal of the Bill.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE CONFERENCE.—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, a short time ago I had the honour to inform your Lordships that in all probability in a few days I should have to announce to you that the Conference had agreed to the bases preliminary to a peace; or, upon the other hand, that the object of the negotiations had failed, and that war would be renewed on the termination of an armistice. My Lords, I am sorry to say that the latter alternative appears to be most likely. On Monday next I shall lay upon your Lordships' table, by command of Her Majesty, the Protocols of the Conference, and in so doing I shall state what has been the general course of the negotiations.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD BROUGHAM, in presenting a Bill for the Prevention of Bribery in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, said, he found in the other House great expectations, he might rather say apprehensions, were entertained, of a general election this Session, and be they well or ill grounded, at all events this was certain to happen next Session. He was, therefore, led to the consideration of those corrupt practices he had so often brought to the attention of the House, and in which he had proposed Resolutions some years ago as well as introduced measures. His noble Friend, then President of the Council (Lord Lansdowne) admitting all that the Resolutions asserted, complained that no measure was propounded, and he (Lord Brougham) pledged himself to bring one forward. That pledge he now rose to redeem, in presenting a Bill to the House for the future prevention of bribery and corrupt practices. Nothing could be more futile than the objection sometimes taken to such a measure originating in that House—their Lordships had the same right as the other House to take up the subject, and they had exercised that right again and again. The very Bribery Bill of George II.'s time was a remarkable instance. There were two important provisions of the Act inserted in this House (as their Journals of May, 1729, showed). One was a money clause, raising the penalty from fifty to five hundred pounds. Unhappily having never been enforced, as, indeed, none of the Act had been, except the other section, added by this House, which had been constantly in active operation, he meant that provision that the last determination of Election Committees should be binding on all persons and in all times. The Commons were minded to object to these Amendments of the Lords, but Sir W. Pulteney (afterwards Lord Bath) reprobated this objection as soon as it was urged; he said—

“The Lords were the proper guardians as well as the Commons of the purity as well as freedom of the election; and the Lords were the guardians, not only as a branch of the Legislature co-ordinate to themselves (to wit, the House of Commons), but as the supreme court of judicature of the realm; and no man having a value for liberty could grudge the Lords the honour of rendering the Bribery Bill more complete and more efficacious.”

This sound and rational opinion prevailed, and the Commons (though by a very narrow majority) accepted the Lords' Amendments. It was lamentable to reflect how this and all former measures had failed to suppress these pernicious and demoralizing practices. They had, on the contrary, gone on increasing at each dissolution. Nothing could be worse than the facts stated on the best authority. His esteemed Friend, Sir John Pakington, showed, in bringing in his Bill some years ago, that the purchase of votes either directly, or under various pretences of head money, employment of messengers, or charity, was in many boroughs universal. In one, having 3,000 voters, 18 in every 27 were thus bought or sold at £10 a head, so that the candidate must know that he paid £18,000 for his seat. In another place 13 in 14 of the voters took bribes; £5 at the beginning was the price, but it rose as the polling went on, and it became £40 or £50, till at the close as much as £100 had been paid in one or two instances; and the candidate's expenses were as much as £8,000, almost all spent in corrupting the electors. He knew from a learned Friend of his (Lord Brougham's), Member for a county, that he had actually seen a gentleman walking round the streets of a town during a contested election, and provided with a large sum, all of which he paid in what was called head-money, that is in buying the voters. Now it was very lamentable to think how so many measures devised for checking this offence had failed. One of the latest had been proposed by his esteemed Friend Sir John Pakington, but, though well calculated for its purpose, had been defeated by the Select Committee of the Commons, expunging the provisions which contained the proviso which he (Lord Brougham) had the honour of proposing, that every Member and every candidate, on the request of a voter, should make a solemn declaration, not only that he by himself or his agents had given no money in bribes, but that he was wholly ignorant of any money having been so applied. The present Chief Justice of England, then a Member of the House of Commons, a strong supporter of this proviso, which he said he should himself have proposed if Sir John Pakington had not, observed that no person having the least regard for his character, could possibly make the declaration, if thousands of his money had been spent in bribery by his agents. The House of Commons' Select Committee, however, struck the declaration out of the Bill; and when it came up to this House, as without it the Bill was not merely useless, but mischievous, their Lordships refused to pass it. All attempts to check bribery having proved fruitless, and it being generally supposed to have increased under all the laws made against it, he (Lord Brougham) ventured to hope that the course he now took might prove more successful. When his Act of 1811 effectually put an end to the slave trade, which all the penalties and the loss of ships had not materially affected, the effect was produced by treating it as a crime, because though the gains of the traffic were such as to make men run the risk of capture, they would not expose themselves to the risk of being tried and condemned; so he trusted that those who encountered the expense of contested elections, and exposed themselves to the pecuniary penalties of the Acts of George II. and George III., from the anxiety to have a seat in Parliament, and their agents hired to bribe for them, would not expose themselves to the risk of being sent to the treadmill. The Bill which he presented was drawn according to the provisions of the existing Acts, that of George II. in 1729, and that of Lord Eldon in 1809, with this difference, that it made those offences punishable as a misdemeanour with a year's imprisonment, with or without hard labour, and he prayed their Lordships to give it a first reading.

A Bill for the more effectual Prevention of Bribery and Corruption in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament—presented by the Lord BROUGHAM and VAUX; read 1^a, and to be printed. (No. 155.)

MOUNT ST. BERNARD'S REFORMATORY.EXPLANATION.

EARL GRANVILLE, referring to the debate which had taken place on a previous evening, said, he desired to read to their Lordships a letter which had just been received by the Secretary of State for the Home Department—

"Office of Reformatories and Certified Industrial Schools, 15, Parliament Street, S.W.

"Leeds, June 22, 1864—St. Bernard's Reformatory.

"My dear Sir George Grey,—I observe that Lord Berners asserted, on the authority of some parties at Ashby, that on my inquiry into the recent outbreak, I had not inquired of either of the magistrates or the police upon the subject, and that my report, therefore, could not be depended on.

"I beg to mention for your satisfaction on the matter, that I had a full private conference with the superior of the Ashby divisional police, whose men were in charge of the delinquents, and that from him I had the full particulars which I have given.

"As to the magistrates, I found the report made in Mr. Ashby's letter to you substantially correct, and the managers of the reformatory fully admitted the circumstances detailed. There was, therefore, no reason for troubling them on the subject.

"The business in hand was not so much to settle the facts—for they were plain and undisputed—but to get at the cause of the disturbance, and to see whether that was a transient and incidental impulse that might be safely expected not to occur again, or a corrupt and inefficient style of discipline that would be sure to lead to a recurrence of the riot. I think I had fair grounds for concluding in favour of the first of these alternatives.

"I should be glad if the inaccuracy of the charge made by Lord Berners against my inquiry could be brought out. I have the honour to be yours very faithfully,

FACILITIES FOR DIVINE WORSHIP IN COLLEGIATE SCHOOLS BILL [H.L.]

(No 117.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said he had been asked to undertake the charge of the measure by a clergyman in his diocese, who was at once the incumbent of his parish, the patron of the living, and the founder of a large chartered school in his parish, and who in these three capacities found himself inconvenienced from the want of some such powers as this Bill would confer. He had submitted the Bill to Convocation, and he believed that no objection had been taken to it in either

House; and he had received communications from a large number of beneficed clergymen, all on the whole in its favour. The object of the Bill was twofold. The first provision was to allow the Bishop of a diocese to license one or more of the masters of any collegiate school or college, being in priest's orders, to perform divine service in the chapel of a school, and to administer the sacraments strictly to the inmates of the school exempt from all control from or responsibility to the incumbent of the parish. In Committee on the Bill he proposed to strike out the words in one of the clauses "or connected therewith," as he thought they were too large, and might include those who properly belonged to the care of the parish clergyman. He should also propose to introduce a provision for the disposal of the alms collected at the communion in these chapels. When one of these schools was built in a small parish, there was sometimes great inconvenience occasioned to the parishioners, the church of the parish being, perhaps, hardly large enough to receive the pupils without displacing the other worshippers. It was desirable that the boys should have full facilities for their religious duties, while at the same time the latter ought not to be incommoded. There was also a special advantage in making the head of a school the religious instructor. It sanctified the relation between master and pupil, and it might also be said to carry out the wishes of the parents who had selected the head of the school as the instructor of their boys. Neither was it really an interference with the proper duties of a parochial clergyman, because the parish church was founded for the parishioners and not for these schools, which had sprung up since. No one would be more ready to oppose any interference with the rights and independence of the parochial clergy than himself, but he believed that nothing but good would flow from this Bill. He had received a letter on this point from the parish priest of Hurst Pierpoint, in Sussex, in which parish there was one of the largest of these schools, who expressed his hearty gratification at the Bill. The only other provision of the Bill was to allow, with the consent of the clergyman of the parish and the Bishop of the diocese, the parish church to be used for these services until a chapel should be built for the school; of course at times which would not interfere with the regular service of the church. He hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would allow the Bill to be read a second time.

Moved. That the Bill be now read 2^a.
—(The Bishop of Oxford.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he entertained grave objections to the Bill; and he hoped that the right rev. Prelate would be induced either to withdraw the measure altogether for the present Session, or give their Lordships ample time for its consideration. He would undertake to say that the provisions of this measure were wholly unknown throughout the country. It was only ordered to be printed on the 20th June, and he was sure that not twenty of the 20,000 beneficed clergy throughout the kingdom knew a word about it. It appeared to him that the Bill would interfere seriously with the rights and independence of the parochial clergymen of the Church of England: The 3rd clause authorized the use of the parish church (with the consent of the incumbent) as the college chapel. Now the Rubrics directed that the money collected during the Sacrament should be applied to pious and charitable uses; but here there was no provision that the minister of the parish should receive it—it might be applied to building the college chapel. Then Clause 5 would enable the Bishop to license any one to perform “the services aforesaid,” though it was difficult to put a precise meaning upon that expression. The effect of the clause would be that the Bishop of the diocese would have power, with or without the assent of the rector or vicar, to thrust any one into his pulpit. He did not say that such was the intention of the right rev. Prelate, but that was the interpretation which the Bill would bear. That being the case, without going further into the provisions of the Bill, to many of which he entirely objected, he must express his hope that the right rev. Prelate would not press the measure, otherwise he (Lord Shaftesbury) should feel it his duty to move that it be read a second time that day six months.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that he certainly was not prepared for the opposition threatened to the Bill, which simply legalized that which had been constantly the practice in parishes where there were chartered schools, and set at rest some questions which had sometimes been raised in matters of detail. He certainly should be very sorry to see any Bill adopted by Parliament which would affect injuriously the position of the parochial clergy.

LORD PORTMAN said, that the most rev. Prelate had spoken of chartered schools, and if the Bill were confined to them the objection to it might not have been very strong; but the provisions of the Bill went much further, and, therefore, if his noble Friend divided their Lordships upon the question he should vote for the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was of opinion that the Bill would introduce a very dangerous innovation. He had no doubt of the good intentions of the right rev. Prelate who had introduced the Bill; but, at the same time, he must observe that there was no grammar school in the kingdom which might not come within its provisions. There was nothing which, from the earliest times, had been more specially enjoined by the founders of these institutions than that the scholars should attend divine service in the parish church—it was the particular desire of the founders to connect their foundations with the parochial system. This desire their Lordships were now asked by this Bill entirely to set aside. They were asked to sanction a measure which would allow within the walls of any private chapel the performance of a service in which any amount of ceremony, any sensuous observance, might be displayed, though it might be entirely at variance with the mode in which Divine worship was usually performed in parish churches. There would be in such cases no public superintendence, and there would be no opportunity of discovering what were the forms of worship, or what ceremonies and solemnities were introduced. He thought it would be better to adhere to the old and wholesome injunction in the charters, that the master with his scholars should attend the parish church on the Sunday. With respect to some of the latter provisions, he would ask the right rev. Prelate to pause before proceeding with them, and if the right rev. Prelate persisted, he thought the best course would be to support the Motion which the noble Earl had threatened.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that after the expression of opinion they had just heard he thought it might be wise to defer the second reading, but was surprised to hear that there was anything dangerous in the principle of the Bill. The system which it was sought to establish was that in use at all the great schools; and at Rugby it was regarded as one of the greatest improvements introduced by his illustrious predecessor, that he had the boys in the school chapel and kept their religious instruction entirely in his own hands. The greatest satisfaction was expressed with that change, though if the law had been put in force it might have been put a stop to by the clergyman of the parish. The intention now was to legalize that which could be at present done only by sufferance. At the same time, if any danger was likely to result from the Bill, it might be well to give time for consideration.

EARL GREY said, he trusted his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) would withdraw his opposition and allow the Bill to be read the second time. There might be questions of detail which it would be necessary to consider in Committee, but the principle of the Bill was a very simple one, the object being to give facilities for affording religious instruction in schools. He could not say that the law as it at present stood was in a satisfactory state. The law allowed Roman Catholic and Dissenting ministers to give religious instruction to the boys under their care, and why should ministers of the Established Church be debarred from doing so?

EARL RUSSELL thought that his noble Friend's objections were not entirely without foundation, for some of the provisions of the Bill would seriously interfere with the rights of rectors and vicars. The object of the Bill might be a very desirable one, but without the general consent of the clergy it might lead to considerable evil; and the clergy ought, therefore, to have time to consider its provisions. The right rev. Prelate who spoke last (the Bishop of London) had stated what was the practice at Rugby, and said that it was by the sufferance of the rector. But it was a very different thing between a rector allowing these services to take place in his parish and the giving of power by an Act of Parliament, which would enable these services to be performed without the consent of the rector or vicar.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he was in the hands of their Lordships, so far as the progress of the measure was concerned, but he had not yet heard any reasons to induce him to desist from persevering with the Bill, the opponents of which seemed, he must say, to view it with preternatural suspicion. He should call it trifling with their Lordships if he had not thoroughly considered much more than had been urged upon their Lordships. He was at a loss to understand what opposition there could be to the principle of the Bill, and really until he had read that day in a newspaper which represented the extreme views of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), some of the views which the noble Earl had just expressed, he was ignorant of the intention to offer any opposition to the progress of the Bill. The objections taken by the noble Earl were purely matters of detail. Surely, every one of their Lordships would feel that the sort of preaching required by a common agricultural population was not that which would be suitable to their sons; the classes of hearers were entirely different, and their powers of comprehending what was said to them were altogether diverse; besides which there was a great advantage in bringing boys under the direct spiritual teaching of their masters. Those sermons of Dr. Arnold, which they all so much admired, would not have been delivered by him if he had been preaching to a mixed congregation. The kind of objections which had been urged showed the animus of the opposition, and it was evidently a previously formed conclusion that there must be some mischief in the Bill. As to the validity of the objection, that every parish minister might have somebody holding different views "thrust" upon him, this Bill applied only to incorporated schools, and he would ask how many of the 10,000 parishes of England had incorporated schools in them? Then, as to the pious zeal of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, who spoke of the "sensuous observances" that were to be performed in these chapels, he thought such an objection scarcely deserved an answer. Did not the noble and learned Lord know that these chapels must be licensed by the Bishop of the diocese? Surely that formed a sufficient answer to the complaint of the noble and learned Lord. The truth was that there was an evil to be remedied. They were positively told, indeed, that differences would be most likely to arise when these rights were regulated by Act of Parliament than at present. That was contrary to all the experience he had ever had of human nature. This was a simple measure for allowing that to be done with reference to chartered schools which the experience of all our great schools had shown to be essential to their well being and their good order. This Bill was calculated to bring peace and not war into every parish which it affected, and only those parishes were concerned which possessed chartered schools, and instead of being applicable to every school that called itself a college it would only be applicable to incorporated schools. It seemed to him that there was great force in the argument of the noble Earl (Earl Grey), that while you allowed ministers of every other denomination to minister in things spiritual to the children under their charges, you laid an embargo on priests of your own Church to do this under the direct licence of the Bishop. He could see no ground for consenting to delay, and he hoped their Lordships would not be deterred by the objections which had been stated, but would give the Bill a second reading.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the Bill involved a large question, and he would rather that longer time were given for considering its provisions.

LORD CRANWORTH suggested that the Bill should be read a second time, and that a late day might be fixed for the Committee.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he was quite ready to assent to that course. He thought the measure might be very properly considered at that stage of the Session, and that when the House was so full it was an appropriate occasion for their Lordships to give their assent to the principle of the Bill. Matters of detail might be considered in Committee.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he was satisfied that nothing could be worse than to establish a kind of monastic system, which would have the effect of withdrawing the boys from the parish church. At the same time it was not only advisable, but absolutely necessary, that the boys should be for a certain time subject to the religious tuition of their masters. He still believed that, under the fifth clause, the Bishop of the diocese, with or without the consent of the incumbent, might license the master to occupy the pulpit of the parish church.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he challenged the noble Earl to mention any portion of the Bill which would be open to such an interpretation. It was expressly stated in the words of the Bill, as it was the intention of the framer, that the master could only enter the pulpit of the parish church with the consent of the incumbent, received from time to time.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that he believed, and others concurred in that belief, that the fifth clause was liable to that interpretation. He, therefore, thought the matter was one which required further consideration.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was understood to say the consent of the rector was undoubtedly necessary, but it would be open to question whether the consent would not be binding after it had been once given.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he proposed that it should be necessary to procure the consent of the incumbent from time to time.

Motion agreed to : Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday, the 5th of July next.

CATHEDRAL MINOR CORPORATIONS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to substitute fixed instead of fluctuating incomes for the Members of certain Minor Corporations in certain of the Cathedral Churches in England—Was presented* by The LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK; and read 1^a. (No. 157.)

ARMY—ENGINEER OFFICERS AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, What is the number of Engineer Officers and Men employed at South Kensington, and what are the duties they perform?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that there were two Engineer Officers at present employed in the South Kensington Museum, and a third was about to enter on his duties there. There were also twelve Sappers and Miners usually employed in superintending the lighting and other arrangements, and in learning the arts of photography and drawing. These officers were not, however, borne upon the Estimates of the War Department, but were entirely connected with the Museum. For a detailed explanation of their duties he must refer the noble Lord to one of his right hon. Friends to whose Department they were attached.

ARMY—RIFLE PRACTICE NEAR THE NEW CROYDON RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the situation of the Butt which has been erected for Rifle Practice near the New Croydon Railway, between the Streatham Common and the Thornton Heath Stations; and whether the War Office are satisfied that the Range can be used without danger to the public?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied that the Rifle Range in question had been examined, as all Ranges were, by an Officer, who reported satisfactorily on it, and stated it was safe. The Railway Company also were consulted as to the arrangement prepared for the safety of the trains, and no objection had been raised until within a very few days ago, when Mr. Richards called the attention of the War Department to the alleged danger to the railway in question. It was immediately arranged that one of the Assistant Inspectors of Volunteers should proceed to re-inspect the Range. He would have gone down that day, but Mr. Richards could not have met him, but he would go down to-morrow and meet Mr. Richards and several Volunteer Officers, and inspect the Butt.

ARMY—MARCHWOOD POWDER MAGAZINE.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State

for War, What is the actual quantity of Gunpowder stored at Marchwood Magazine; and if he has the opinion of competent Military Officers as to the safety of Southampton in the event of an explosion of this Magazine?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the quantity of gunpowder at present stored at Marchwood was 50,000 tons. It was not stored in one magazine, but in seven distinct magazines, and the greatest quantity in any one of them was 28,000 barrels. Before the hon. Member gave notice of this question, in consequence of some apprehension that existed in the minds of the people of Southampton, a Report was called for from Colonel Gordon, commanding the Engineers, the principal officer of artillery, and the storekeeper, with regard to the safety of the magazine, and they stated that they had examined it very minutely, and they were of opinion there was no place in which powder might be stored with greater safety than at Marchwood. It was a mile and a half from Southampton, in a district not very densely populated. There were no houses near it except those occupied by government officials. The most stringent regulations were in force; they were far more strict than those applying to private magazines; and from the position of the magazines and the excellent manner in which they were managed, he thought that there was no reason to apprehend any danger.

ARMY—FIELD ALLOWANCE TO TROOPS ON THE GOLD COAST.—QUESTION.

GENERAL PEEL said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, in reference to his statement that the Troops landed from the Megara, in August, 1863, on the Gold Coast were not intended to wage war against the King of the Ashantees, Whether those Troops had not drawn field allowance before they sailed from Jamaica; and, if so, on what grounds it had been granted to them?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the Troops which landed from the Megara on the Gold Coast from the West Indies had not the field allowance before they left Jamaica. Colonel Conran landed in August, and on the 7th September he acquainted the Home authorities, that as it was probable the troops he had landed under his command would have to take the field, he had sanctioned the issue of the allowance, and also permitted the men to draw it from the day of their embarkation. It was, perhaps, somewhat irregular to do so. There was some little doubt whether the antedating should be permitted, but under all the circumstances of the case it was permitted, and the allowance was drawn from the date of embarkation; and it was not till the 7th September that Colonel Conran informed the War Department that he had sanctioned it.

ARMY—REQUISITION FROM THE WAR OFFICE TO THE ADMIRALTY.

QUESTION.

GENERAL PEEL said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, The date and terms of any Requisition from the War Office to the Admiralty for transports to remove the Troops from the Gold Coast; and whether such Requisition was marked "pressing" and "immediate," and what was the answer to it?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, it would be recollected that the Secretary of State for the Colonies on the 20th of May made a statement to the House respecting the arrangements made for the withdrawal of the Troops from the Gold Coast. On the following day all the arrangements respecting the withdrawal were made between his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell) and the Secretary of State for War. On the same day letters were written from the War Office to the Admiralty and the Horse Guards informing them of the determination that had been come to. Both those letters were marked "pressing" and "immediate."

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he wished to know whether the sanitary arrangements for Field Service laid down by the late Lord Herbert have been attended to?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Will my hon. Friend give notice of his Question?

GENERAL PEEL: The noble Lord has not answered the latter part of my Question. What was the answer from the Admiralty?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Admiralty replied immediately by letter through the Horse Guards, asking what number of Troops would have to be conveyed. The letter from the War Office stated that it had been determined to remove a considerable portion of the force from the Gold Coast, and requested that the requisite quantity of freight might be taken up for their removal.

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE BOOTY.

QUESTION.

GENERAL PEEL said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, From what source the expense of the reference to the Admiralty Court in the case of Banda and Kirwee Booty is to be defrayed?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, according to the general practice of the Court of Admiralty, the expense of any proceeding in regard to Prize Money is paid out of the general proceeds of the Prize Money, and is not charged to the individual officers except in cases in which, in the opinion of the Judge, the allegations of the parties have been improper, unfounded, or deserving to be visited by costs. A reference has been made by the Government, but there are several other claims besides those of the Banda claimants to which the attention of the Court of Admiralty is to be directed, and I cannot say whether the Court will be of opinion that they have been improperly brought forward or not.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Will the noble Lord lay on the table the terms of the reference to the Court of Admiralty?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Yes, if the hon. Gentleman will move for it.

THE ROYAL FORESTS.—QUESTION.

MR. COX said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any steps have been taken to carry into effect the recommendation of the Select Committee on Royal Forests (Essex) presented on the 9th day of June, 1863, which recommendation was as follows:—

"Your Committee report that a considerable extent of Ground has been enclosed without any consideration being paid for the Forestal Right of the Crown over them, which do not appear to have been either purchased or redeemed: and your Committee recommend that immediate steps be taken by the Crown to assert its right and to abate such enclosures."

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the recommendation was only one of several made by the Committee. They also recommended that the forests should be enclosed, and the forestal rights of the Crown sold. Various reasons had prevented the recommendation from being carried out, but the general subject was receiving the attention of the Treasury.

UNCLAIMED WRECK.—QUESTION.

Mr. ROGERS said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, When a Return on the subject of Unclaimed Wreck, ordered on the 29th of April, will be laid upon the table?

Mr. HUTT said, in the absence of his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, he had to state that all the information was not yet obtained, but he believed it would be complete in a few days.

ANNUAL REPORT ON OUR COLONIAL POSSESSIONS.—QUESTION.

Mr. ROGERS said, he would also beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, When the Annual Report for 1863, on the state of our Colonial Possessions, presented on March 18th, will be in the hands of Members?

Mr. CARDWELL said, in reply, that the first part of the Report for 1863 was almost ready to be delivered, and the second part was in the hands of the printer.

NAVY—THE "RESEARCH."—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the Report of an action which took place last Sunday between the United States frigate Kearsarge and the Confederate ship Alabama; and whether they have considered the Report of the Commander-in-Chief at Devonport on the preparation for battle of Her Majesty's ship Research. With the permission of the House he would read the Report of the Commander-in-Chief at Devonport. It was as follows:—

"The space in the battery is so confined that the men have not room to work the guns with that facility that is required. 1. The battery is 33ft. in length by 32ft. in breadth inside; within this space are four heavy guns, upwards of 80 men, funnel, wheel, hatchway for supplying powder and shell. 2. There is a difficulty in traversing the guns from the broadside to the bow and quarter ports. 3. When the broadside guns were fired with extreme train, foremost ones to the left, after ones to the right, the captains of them could not stand to direct and fire them. These points being of great importance, I have considered it right to bring them before the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty."

He would also beg to ask, Whether, as the last named Report shows, that this class of ship cannot fight her guns with advantage, and the first named Report shows that she will easily be destroyed in action, Her Majesty's Government will continue to build ships which cannot be expected either to fight or swim; and he would further ask, as the advantage of guns of large calibre has been so clearly shown in the above named action, whether Her Majesty's Government will at once obtain a proper supply of large rifled guns for the service of the Navy?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: In answer, Sir, to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, I have to state that the Admiralty have considered, as I suppose everybody else has done, the report of the action which took place last Sunday between the Kearsarge and the Alabama, which, I may remark, however, has no reference whatever to the Question of the Research. The Admiralty have likewise considered the Report of the Commander-in-Chief at Devonport on the preparation for battle of Her Majesty's Research. That Report goes to the effect that there is not room enough to work the guns, in consequence of the wheel, funnel, and other matters being within the battery. We are taking steps to remove them. These, however, are matters of detail, and in other respects I have no reason to believe that there is any dissatisfaction with the Research. A few days ago I was on board that vessel, and I asked the captain—a young, active, and intelligent officer—whether he was satisfied with her fighting qualities. He replied that he was perfectly satisfied on that point. With respect to the comparison which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has drawn between the Research and the Alabama, perhaps he is not aware that the Alabama was a wooden ship of light scantling, whereas the Research is armour-plated. Therefore, there can be no comparison drawn between the two ships. With regard to the further Question, whether Her Majesty's Government will continue to build ships which cannot be expected either to fight or swim, I must state that Her Majesty's Government have no intention to build ships that can neither fight nor swim. These vessels are undergoing a fair trial, and I ask for them fair play. I ask likewise fair play for another experimental ship going out in a few days—the Royal Sovereign, designed by a talented officer of the Navy, Captain Coles. I shall be happy to make a frank statement in regard to these ships when they have undergone a fair trial. With respect to the third Question, about the guns, the hon. and gallant Member must be aware that the Government are taking steps to procure heavier rifled guns. The hon. and gallant Gentleman was present at the trials at Shoburness, when the average weight of shot was 167 lbs., the average charge of powder was 30 lbs., and the heaviest charge was as high as 50 lbs. The weight of the heaviest shot was 300 lbs. The Admiralty have ordered a considerable number of 10½-inch guns, throwing 150 lbs. shot, smooth bore, and they have likewise ordered a large number of 7-inch rifled 100 pounders. The Prince Albert, the Royal Sovereign, and the Minotaur will go to sea carrying 12-ton guns, throwing 10½-inch shot. I think this will show that the Government are alive to the importance of the subject.

NAVY—THE TRANSPORT "GLADIATOR." QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he also wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, To lay upon the table of the House any Reports from Captain Shortt, of the Gladiator, on the subject of the convenience and capacity of that ship for the conveyance of troops during this Commission.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET stated, in reply, that it was very objectionable to lay on the table Reports of Officers to the heads of Departments. Therefore he could not agree to lay upon the table the Reports to which the hon. Baronet had referred; but if the hon. Baronet chose to move for them upon a future occasion, he (Lord C. Paget) would be ready to state his reasons for not agreeing to the Motion.

ARMY—TRIAL OF HEAVY RIFLED GUNS. QUESTION.

MR. MONSELL said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, What is the cause of the delay in the competitive trial to be made by the Ordnance Select Committee of the heavy rifled guns on various systems now lying ready at Woolwich; and whether there is any reason for delaying this trial until the extended trial, by another Committee, of the Armstrong and Whitworth systems is brought to a conclusion?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the experimental establishment at Shoburness was almost entirely engaged in the trial of the Armstrong and Whitworth systems, and it was quite impossible that the Ordnance Select Committee, to whom was intrusted the trial of the other systems of rifling, could carry on their course of experiments at the same time. A proposal, however, had a short time ago been made, that the trial of the heavy rifled guns on various systems should be made at Woolwich at short range as far as it could be done without danger, and that proposal was now under consideration by the Horse Guards.

DOCKS AT MALTA.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, before putting the Question of which he had given notice, he wished, by way of explanation, to state he had lately received a letter, written by an eminent Member of Council. ["Order!" "Question!"] Well, his Question was, To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government have received a letter, dated the 10th of June, from the Chamber of Commerce of Malta to His Excellency the Governor of Malta, expressing their hopes "that His Excellency the Governor will be pleased to direct the necessary steps to be taken in order to obtain from Her Majesty's Government the abandonment of the contemplated Dock at the Marsa, in view of the very serious inconvenience to which it will subject the Mercantile Marine after it shall have been extended from the French Creek;" whether he is aware that this letter was decided on in a very full meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, composed of the principal Merchants of Malta, and that the letter contains a request that it may be forwarded to the Home Government; and whether there will be any objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to lay this letter upon the table of the House?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, he had not received the letter alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member, but as soon as it arrived he would be happy to lay it on the table.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, he would now beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, whether the report is true that the works of the proposed new Dock at Malta are being carried on with great activity, although the Vote for that work has not yet been sanctioned by Parliament, and the question is now under the consideration of the Committee sitting upon Docks and Basins.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied that immediately after he announced in the House that the Vote for the proposed Dock at Malta would not be proceeded with, a telegram was sent to the Admiral on the station—namely, on the 5th of May last—to the effect that while the Question was under the consideration of the Select Committee, the works of the Marsa Dock were to be suspended.

UNITED STATES—CASE OF MR. JAMES M'HUGH.—QUESTION.

Mr. BUTT said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the papers relative to the case of Mr. James M'Hugh, moved for on the 14th of June, will be produced; and whether any Communication has been received from the Government of the United States holding out any expectation of an early release of Mr. M'Hugh?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, he expected by every mail to hear of the release of Mr. M'Hugh, and he hoped he might be able to lay it on the table to-morrow.

ASHANTEE WAR—OFFICERS AT CAPE COAST CASTLE.—QUESTION.

Mr. LONGFIELD said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, If the same consideration which is shown to the relatives of Officers who fall in battle will be extended to the relatives of those Officers who lost their lives in the late campaign on the Gold Coast; and if the purchase money for the Commission of the late Major Merrick will be returned to his representatives?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that the Pension Warrant did not sanction the issue of the same pension to the relatives of Officers who had died of disease as to the relatives of those who had fallen in action. With reference to the latter part of the Question the relatives of Captain (not Major) Merrick would not receive the price of his commission, because the Warrant also laid it down that the purchase money should be returned in the case of Officers who had been killed in action, or had died of their wounds within six months; but, as he stated the other night, Captain Merrick landed from the Megara in August, 1863, and died of fever at Cape Coast Castle in the following October, and had never taken part, as far as he was aware, in any expedition to the interior.

Captain Talbot

STAMP DUTIES—ORDERS ON BANKERS. QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that an order addressed to bankers or other persons for any payment of money, whether as dividend or otherwise, and which hitherto has been exempt from Stamp Duty, as being neither a Letter nor a Power of Attorney, is, by a new construction put by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue on the Act of the present Session, to be made liable to the Duty of Five Shillings, or any other Duties charged on Letters or Powers of Attorney; and, if so, whether such new construction will not be a great hardship on individuals, and an interference with established usage?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that his hon. Friend must have been misinformed—at least, the facts which had come within his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) knowledge were entirely different. The Act of the present Session had no bearing on this subject, except to reduce the Duties which were recited in it, and were not applicable to the instruments of which his hon. Friend had spoken. No new construction had been put on the law as it stood, and as it had stood before the Act of the present Session. What had taken place was this—some persons felt a doubt as to whether the orders to which his hon. Friend had referred were liable to Stamp Duty, as was the case with Powers of Attorney, and the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown was that they were so liable. But the date of that opinion was as old as the month of December, 1860, and he was not cognizant of any further proceedings having been taken since that time. It was not a question of penalty, no penalty being imposed for not using a stamp. It was purely a question of discretion in the parties as to the legality of the instrument they used, and the risk of being unable to enforce it in case it should be questioned in a court of justice.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly satisfactory.

PENAL SERVITUDE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. HUNT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home De-that not only the anxiety of the House, but that of the public at large, upon the subject to which it relates, is entitled to some communication from Her Majesty's Government. The Conference met yesterday, in the afternoon, after the Levee, and it adjourned to Saturday, when it will meet at an earlier hour. The probability is that that meeting of Saturday will be the last and final meeting of the Conference; and it will be my duty on Monday to lay upon the table of this House all the papers connected with the proceedings of the Conference—I hope including the proceedings that may take place on Saturday. I shall also feel it my duty, and my noble Friend in the other House will also feel it to be his duty in his place, not only to lay the papers on the table of the House, but to make a statement connected with the transactions to which the papers relate.

MR. HUNT: Sir, I should like to ask the noble Lord, whether the Conference will meet on Saturday to deliberate, or simply to go through some formulary? I think this House is entitled to know whether the Conference has closed its deliberations or not, and whether it meets on Saturday to go through some matter of form?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I stated my opinion that the meeting on Saturday will be the final meeting. It is impossible for me to say what will take place at a meeting not yet assembled. I say that on Monday I shall lay on the table a Report of all the proceedings of the Conferences, accompanied, I hope, by the proceedings of Saturday.

MR. DISRAELI: I conclude from what the noble Lord says, that the documents he proposes to lay upon the table will be in the hands of Members on Tuesday.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: They will be laid on the table on Monday, and I presume they will be distributed with the papers on the following morning.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he rose to move the second reading of the Bill, and with a view of correcting some misapprehensions which prevailed on the subject, both in and out of the House, he would take the opportunity of briefly stating the objects of the measure. From time immemorial the corporation of the City of London possessed the right of measuring all corn that came into the port, and was entitled to all the profits and emoluments arising from the discharge of that duty. It was, in fact, an office of profit. It was not an office to which a simple duty was attached, but an office of profit in the strict sense of the term. The City claimed its right to the office from prescription, from a time to which legal memory did not go back. As far back as the time of King John the right was possessed by the City, and the right was then in dispute. It was disputed again in the reign of James I., and the dispute was finally settled by the grant of a charter confirming the City in the prescriptive right which they had enjoyed for so many centuries. That right was further recognized by the Royal Commission of 1853. By an Act of the current Session, introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, it was provided that henceforth the duties on grain should be ascertained by weight and not by measurement. That Act was to come into force on the 1st of September, and if no further provision were made, the consequence would be that the Government would require the grain to be weighed, while the corporation would claim their right of having it measured. He (Mr. Crawford) had, therefore, moved the insertion of a proviso saving the right of the City; but he was advised to provide for the case by special legislation. Hence the present Bill. The gentlemen representing the corn trade had placed themselves in communication with the corporation. They were met by the City in a liberal spirit, and the terms come to were fair both to the public and to the trade. Those terms were embodied in the Bill. It commenced by reciting the rights of the City, in terms identical with those used in the Coal Act of 1861, the change which had taken place in the law during the Session in regard to levying duties on grain, and that it was necessary that various small duties now levied should be commuted. It then provided for the levying of a duty of three-eighths of a penny on every cwt. of grain brought into the port of London, the payment of a certain amount of compensation to the Lord Mayor and other officers, who had been in the habit of receiving emoluments out of the existing charges, and the payment of compensation to the small meters and other persons who might be affected by the Bill. Since it had been printed he had had the opportunity of further considering the matter, and the result had been a modification of the Bill, defining what articles should be considered grain, and providing that grain brought into the City by vessels which did not break bulk, should not be subjected to the duty. The Bill, which had been reprinted in its amended form, accordingly provided for a drawback on grain brought into the port of London and exported without being unloaded or broken in bulk. As the Bill stood, the duty was charged on all corn, pulse, and seeds. The corporation proposed to except seeds brought into the port in sacks or casks. These charges the City were willing to forego. But that was not all. When a cargo arrived a report had to be made at the Mansion House, and the charges arising from that process amounted to about £2,000. The City proposed to dispense with the Mansion House formalities, and to remit the charges connected with them. The City would give up £3,000 a year, which was the difference between the new rate per cwt. and the old rate per quarter, and would bear all the compensations to corn-meters and other persons affected by the Bill. By accepting this arrangement the public would be guaranteed against any excess in the charge for weighing above the rate fixed, on account of any rise in the cost of labour or other cause. On the whole, very little would be left to the City in the shape of revenue. In favour of the Bill there were, first, the corporation of the City of London, and next they had the great body of the corn trade. The Chairman of the Committee of the Corn Trade had written a letter to The Times pointing out the advantages which the corn trade would derive from the City performing the office of weighing as it had hitherto done that of measuring. There would be a saving in the charges, and the proper execution of the duty would be guaranteed. The writer added that the arrangement proposed was deemed satisfactory by the trade. Another correspondent of The Times, under the signature of "Civis," also bore testimony to the benefit which the corn trade would derive from the Bill. It had been stated in another letter in the same journal, that a Committee of the House of Commons had recommended the abolition of metage. In the year 1858 a Bill was brought in by the Home Secretary, the 53rd clause of which provided that metage should be abolished, and the 56th clause rendered the City liable for all the compensation to be given to those who might suffer under the operation of the measure. The corporation were heard against these provisions, which were, however, passed with this modification, that the metage should continue for ten years. Subsequently a Motion was made for the recommitment of the Bill, but the debate was cut short, and the Session came to a close without any further steps being taken, and since then nothing had been done. Besides the parties to whom he had referred as being favourable to the Bill, petitions in support of it had been presented from the small meters and the Fellowship Porters. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had given notice of a Motion the effect of which was to treat the Bill as a Private Bill. Now the Bill was not promoted as a Private Bill. It was a supplement to the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill of the present Session, and had been rendered necessary not by any Act of the City, but by the force of legislation. In the next place, it concerned the trade of the metropolis, and the whole district between Staines and Erith, and therefore claimed to be treated as a Public Bill. It also concerned the collection of the public revenue and the rights of the City, which had been dealt with over and over again by Acts of Parliament, such as the corn and wine duties, and other Acts of a similar nature. Without offering any opinion as to the construction of the Standing Orders, he trusted the House would treat the Bill as a Public Bill and give it a second reading.

MR. A. RUSSELL seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Crawford.)

MR. AYRTON, in rising to move the Amendment of which he had given notice, said, the Bill ought to be treated as a private measure because its object was to gain a private advantage for the corporation of London. In principle there was really no difference between the Bill before the House and a Bill promoted by the London and North Western Railway Company, or any other trading association. Let the House look at the manner in which it was introduced. Bills levying duties ought to be founded upon a Resolution previously passed in Committee of the whole House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought in a Bill relative to the payment of certain duties by weight instead of by measure. It was preceded by a Resolution in Committee, stating the amount of duty to be proposed, and it could not be carried beyond the amount agreed to in Committee. Now, that method of proceeding had not been followed in the present instance, though when the Bill came to be examined in detail it would be seen that a private Member should, under no circumstances, be permitted to exercise a power of legislation which was not enjoyed by any responsible Minister of the Crown. But the hon. Member must not be let off from the other horn of the dilemma. The hon. Member had described the Bill as a Private Bill. Now, what were the rules of the House on that subject? They provided that all Bills of a private nature should be classified, and class No. 1 specified, amongst others, "Charters of Corporations, enlarging or altering powers of," one branch of which were Bills levying or altering tolls, rates, or duties. The Bill recited the right of the corporation to measure certain commodities, including grain, and to receive for their own use the wages, rewards, fees, and profits arising therefrom; and it then went on to enact that for every hundredweight of grain brought into the port of London there should be paid to the Mayor and commonalty a sum of three-eighths of a penny. That was the whole taxing power of the Bill, and that tax was to be paid whether any service was performed or not. It was true that other clauses provided that the grain should be weighed if people desired it, and that the work should be done by the fraternity called the Fellowship Porters, who were to be paid for what they did at the rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per cwt. for cargoes under 50 cwt., and $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per cwt. above. So that when they came to the working men the corporation knew well enough how to draw the Bill. The men were to be paid only when they did work, but the corporation were to receive the dues without doing anything for them. After that statement of the object and nature of the Bill, he thought there could be no doubt that it fell within the Standing Orders as to Private Bills. The hon. Member, in speaking of the corporate rights, had done well to say that they went back to a period to which the memory of man did not run, especially as the corporation had destroyed their records; at least, being the keepers of them, when it was inconvenient to produce them the corporation said that they could not be found. It unfortunately happened, however, that in the last century they came to Parliament for assistance; and, being required to show what was their actual pecuniary position, they made a statement which was upon the Journals of the House, and in which there was no mention of a single shilling of profit or revenue derived from those sources which the hon. Gentleman said that they had enjoyed from time immemorial. It was true that they claimed the right to appoint meters, but that was all.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY asked the hon. Gentleman when he alleged that the corporation destroyed their records?

MR. AYRTON said, that it was at the time that the corporation appointed a Committee of Secrecy to raise money to pay their debts, which Committee forthwith embarked in transactions which led to the painful scene that occurred in that House when, some hon. Member having asked Mr. Speaker a question with respect to the corporation funds, he left the chair and never appeared again. From that time till 1834 the corporation did very much as they liked, for there were then no Members for the Tower Hamlets. The Royal Commission of 1854 mentioned this claim, as the hon. Member for the City had stated, but they expressed their opinion that the duty ought to cease; and in 1856 a Bill was introduced by the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston), the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) and the then Attorney General, to abolish it. As the present Home Secretary said on one occasion, the obstructive dining power of the corporation was such that it was almost impossible to proceed with a Bill against them, and that measure was withdrawn. In 1858 another Bill was brought in, which also proposed to abolish this tax. That Bill was referred to a Select Committee. The corporation were heard by counsel before the Committee. [Mr. CRAWFORD: Upon one clause only.] The corporation had an opportunity of putting anything before the Committee, which in the end declared that these duties should end in ten years or sooner. It was too late, however, to carry a Bill in that Session of Parliament. In the following year the subject was again brought before a Committee, of which the then Lord Mayor was a Member, and they reported that they saw no reason to doubt the correctness of the conclusions arrived at by the former Committee. He thought he had shown a large amount of authority against the continuance of the duty. It had been attempted to show that it was a legal duty, but although as a rule individuals could not afford to enter into litigation with a wealthy corporation, yet it did happen on one occasion that the magnitude of his interest induced a trader to resist the demand of the corporation, and he filed a Bill calling upon them to show their title to claim this duty. The corporation fought him at every stage, but when the matter got into the House of Lords they withdrew their own appeal, and thus practically admitted that they could not substantiate their claim. The hon. Gentleman, feeling the weakness of his case, asked the House to assent to the Bill because, as he said, it had the sanction of every one except the taxpayers. That, however, was not quite correct. The hon. Gentleman said the corn trade, as represented by the corn market, was in its favour. The truth was, the corporation had been receiving £13,000 a year from the duty without doing anything in return, and although they claimed for themselves the exclusive right of setting up markets in the City and within seven miles thereof, yet they had allowed a close monopoly to grow up which kept the corn market in the hands of a few people, who, for every £200 they had invested, had created by monopoly property worth £1,400. This Corn Exchange was a close body, which had grown upon the corporation like a fungus upon another corrupt body. Of course those people were in favour of the Bill. They were hand and glove with the corporation, and the hand and glove were worthy of each other, for both were unclean. But with all the monopoly they had not yet built themselves a corn market. The hon. Gentleman had also said that the meters had petitioned in favour of the Bill. The sworn meters, who claimed a right to measure grain, had petitioned against the Bill, and it was only the casual meters, who claimed no such right, who had petitioned in its favour. It was also said that the Fellowship Porters approved the Bill. He could only say that the Fellowship Porters had made many complaints to him of the cruel treatment they received from the corporation. In 1835, when Reform was rife, and when there was a probability that the duty upon grain would not endure much longer, the corporation introduced a clause into the document of admission given to Fellowship Porters whereby all vested rights were abandoned. Having thus got rid of all claims for compensation, they then persuaded the fellowship porters to intrust their interests to the care of the corporation, lest they should be ruined. The corporation next made a bargain with the Corn Exchange to reduce the duties, and undertook that the wages of the Fellowship Porters should also be reduced. The corporation, in return for an income of £5,000, or, as he believed, £10,000 a year, allowed the Corn Exchange to oppress these poor men by taking off one-third of their wages. They must never forget that in dealing with the corporation they were not dealing with a public body for public objects only. The claim of the corporation was, that they were entitled to appropriate these funds for their own purposes. They had seen the corporation already become shareholders in a railway, so completely did they consider the corporate funds as property with which they might do as they pleased. The corporation of London, who said they were protecting the Fellowship Porters, had for a long period compelled them to surrender 1d. on every 1s. of their earnings, and had kept up for them a Benefit Society, as compared with which the worst benefit society mentioned in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's late exposition of malversation and fraud was really a pattern of excellency and virtue; for the Benefit Society of the Fellowship Porters was conducted in this wise, that it actually spent £500 a year in dispensing £250 for the benefit of the poor men whose wages were mulcted of 1d. in every 1s. He thought the House should pause before allowing its Standing Orders to be subverted in favour of a measure like that. He had presented petitions from the Dock Companies against the Bill, stating that by their Acts they were authorized to weigh everything in their docks, and they did not understand why they were to be deprived of that power. He had also presented petitions from the great dealers in corn, merchants, and others, who said they did not object to an arrangement for having grain weighed when it was needed, but did object to being compelled to pay a tax for weighing whether they required their grain weighed or not. An enactment of one clause would have been sufficient for the corporation, if their Bill were simply consequent upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer's legislation, but they had taken advantage of that opportunity to bring in a Bill to serve their own private ends alone. Let the City give a pledge that they wanted that Bill for public objects only, and let them limit it to all grain which it was necessary to weigh for revenue purposes and for delivery, and he would assist them to pass it. But if they would not give such a distinct and intelligible pledge, then the House would know that the measure was designed for sinister objects and private aims, for banquets to gratify themselves and their families, and for largess to be distributed among their friends and kindred. Trusting that the House would not permit any corporation, however influential, to subvert its rules and orders, he begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "inasmuch as the Bill seeks to enlarge and alter the powers of the Corporation of the City of London to levy a Rate or Duty, and to alter existing Rates and Duties, on Grain and Seeds imported into the Port of London for the use and benefit of the Corporation, this House is of opinion that the Bill ought not to be proceeded with until the Standing Orders relating to Private Bills be duly complied with,"—(Mr. Ayrton),—instead thereof.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that as the Amendment of the hon. Member related entirely to the Standing Orders of the House, it was desirable that the discussion of the merits should be disentangled from the difficulty suggested, and that the House should decide whether the Bill was a public or private one. In the first instance, he (Colonel Patten) had been under the impression that the measure was a private one; but after looking at several other Bills which had passed the House, he confessed he entertained doubts upon the subject. He, therefore, would respectfully suggest that it would much simplify the discussion if the Speaker would favour them with his opinion on it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he would suggest, that before the right hon. Gentleman gave his opinion, that it was desirable they should be told what the difference was in respect to the Standing Orders between the Bill before the House and the City Police Bill, which was stopped by the corporation.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question raised by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets is one well worthy the consideration of the House, and has quite properly been brought under its notice by the hon. and learned Gentleman. This Bill has certainly many features which are characteristic of a Private Bill. But it has been the policy of late years to introduce Bills relating to the Metropolis as Public Bills, on account of the great extent and the general interests involved. In 1843, and again in 1846, and in 1851, Bills for the regulation of Coal Whippers were treated as Public Bills. In 1845 the Vend and Delivery of Coals in London and Westminster Bill was introduced as a Public Bill. In 1852 the Ballast Heavers (Port of London) Bill, and in 1861 the Annoyance Jurors (Westminster) Bill, were brought in as Public Bills; though if they had related to other towns, they would certainly have been regarded as Private Bills. The Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Bills of 1861 and 1863, which affected the rights of the City to its local dues and taxes, were brought in as Public Bills. The Bill now before the House relates to the port of London, which covers an extensive area, ranging, I believe, over a considerable part of four counties, and containing a population of nearly 3,000,000. It is introduced, not from any desire of the Corporation to disturb the existing state of things, but in consequence of an Act of the present Session, which enacts that the duty on foreign grain shall be levied by weight, instead of by measure. The Corporation propose to accommodate their system to the new law, and to change the system of measuring corn for that of weighing, which has now for the first time been adopted for the purposes of revenue. It appears that under the existing law the measurement of foreign grain by officers of the City, is accepted at the Custom House for charging the import duties; and by this Bill it is proposed that certificates of weight instead of measure shall be furnished to the Custom House for the collection of the public revenue. The Bill concerns the home and foreign trade of the port of London, and also the public revenue; and on these grounds it seems to me that it has been introduced not improperly as a Public Bill. At the same time, as there are allegations of fact in the preamble which are open to dispute, and which require to be established by evidence, I apprehend it will be the pleasure of the House to commit the Bill to a Select Committee, by whom these facts will be inquired into, and any local or private rights may be duly protected.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman would be of material assistance to the House, not only for its direct purpose in throwing light on the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, but also in respect to the vote which they would, he supposed, ultimately have to give on the question, whether the Bill should or should not be read the second time. He assumed that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets would no longer press his Motion on the point of form, but acquiesce in the opinion just delivered from the Chair; and he assumed also that he would not insist on the objection he had raised as to the want of a preliminary Resolution on the introduction of the Bill. Apart from the question, whether or not the Bill required a preliminary Resolution, as being a Bill affecting trade, it was pretty clear that as a Bill affecting taxation it would not require such a Resolution, if, at least, the revenue of the corporation of the City stood on the same footing as the public revenue of the country. Although it was the practice, for the convenience of the House, in moving the reduction of a duty, to do it in the form of a Resolution in Committee of Ways and Means, yet that practice was founded simply on the advantage of giving full information to the House of what the plans of the Government as to the finance of the year might be, and it was quite competent for any Member of the Government, or any independent Member of the House, to introduce any Bill for the reduction of a tax without a preliminary Resolution. The case had been ably stated on both sides. So far as his Parliamentary experience went, and it now extended over a very long period of time, he had never known the duties of a representative of the City of London more ably or satisfactorily discharged than they were by his hon. Friend (Mr. Crawford), who had brought forward the subject in a very clear and practical manner. Then, the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets set out a great deal of matter, he admitted, of much importance, one portion of it being connected with the subject of the reform of the corporation of the City of London. He took it that there were few who sat on those Benches that could look back with entire satisfaction to the part which Parliament had played, or rather had not played, in the reform of the corporation of the City; but it would not be fair or just to the corporation to allow any opinion they entertained on that subject, or any desire they might entertain for a general rearrangement of the local authorities of the metropolis, to influence them in their conduct upon that occasion. Another part of the speech of his hon. and learned Friend consisted of allegations, some of them relating to the title of the corporation to their dues, and to the arrangement proposed to be made for the Fellowship Porters, and to other parts of the Bill which appeared to him fair matter for a Select Committee. His hon. Friend who brought forward the measure had been the first to anticipate the suggestion of the Chair, that the Bill should undergo investigation before a Select Committee: the question before them therefore practically was, whether the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee; or, according to the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets, be summarily rejected. They should remember that the Bill had not grown out of the suit or petition of the corporation. The State had determined that for the public convenience the mode of levying the corn duty should be altered, and the corporation was placed under the necessity of doing one of two things—unless, indeed, it was prepared altogether to abandon what it presumed to be its rights, and that, he thought, no one could expect—either the corporation must come to the House for a Bill like the present, or insist on the intolerable injustice of the double process of weighing for the purpose of the corn duty and measuring for the municipal tax. The corporation, he thought, had taken the right course. So far as the Government were concerned, they had taken a strictly impartial course. They declined to pledge themselves to support the Bill until they heard the whole case; but they did undertake that the corporation should not be defeated in consequence of the period of the Session. It appeared to him on the equity of the case that the Bill ought not to be rejected on the second reading, but should be referred to a Select Committee. The fair presumption might be against that source of civic revenue; that presumption arose from the Report of the Committee: but if it was to be abolished, it should be done not accidentally by availing themselves of any difficulty in which the corporation was placed in consequence of measures adopted by Parliament for the public good, but in a straightforward manner, by a measure directed ad hoc, explicitly and expressly dealing with the question by legislation. He thought it would be a harsh and severe measure under the circumstances if they withheld their sanction from the second reading of the Bill. It would not be a worthy mode of dealing with the subject. He thought the arrangement proposed by the Bill was an equitable one. The corporation relieved the trade of a portion of the tax; it also gave considerable relief in point of time and trouble. He should certainly support the second reading, with the view of referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had very fairly stated the manner in which the Bill came before the House, and as the judgment from the Chair had disposed of the Amendment, he need not refer at any length to the manner in which the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had unburdened himself of his peculiar notions with regard to the City of London. The hon. Member said that he represented the Docks and the Fellowship Porters. He ought to be aware that the Docks charged the public $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent more than the City of London charged. As to the Fellowship Porters, they came before the House last Session under the auspices of the hon. Member; but from the petition of an immense majority it appeared that the control of the funds of that body was in the hands of a few who wished to distribute them among themselves. The fact was that, the moment the question was raised, the corporation had called a meeting of the trade, those who were most competent to give an opinion as to the work to be done, the prices that should be charged for it, and what the trade were prepared to pay. The corporation deliberated upon it, and it was found the charge made in the Bill was fair and reasonable to have the work satisfactorily done. It was very easy to throw any quantity of dirt upon a public body, but he declared emphatically that the random assertions made by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets on a former evening were totally unfounded.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, there was no one who had more zealously devoted himself to the interests of the metropolis at large, as distinguished from that small portion of it compromised within the City, than the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. The views of that Gentleman might be peculiar in the eyes of a former Lord Mayor, but they were shared by a large body of inhabitants of the metropolis. The Corporation, paying its servants liberally, and always taking pains to secure the best available talent, was sure of having its work well done; and he believed its officers had wisely advised the Corporation to make that concession on which he congratulated the public, and which he believed was traceable directly to the opposition thrown in their way. The Government having cast their protecting influence over this Bill, he hoped would take pains to secure the appointment of an impartial Committee.

MR. HUBBARD said, he doubted the propriety of introducing into a Commutation Bill a preamble reciting the existence of a prerogative which had been much doubted, often disputed, and in many cases could not be enforced. He thought it a dangerous thing that the corporation should be enabled to claim as a debt due by the owners of a cargo so much per cwt., especially as a debt preceding the execution of the work which formed the consideration. As the measure stood, it would establish a monopoly and ignore the changes which mechanical facilities might hereafter provide for the execution of the work. He thought it highly undesirable to stereotype a rate of charge without reserving some power of competition.

MR. AYRTON said, that after the decision from the Chair, he had no option but to submit to the proposal of the Government, but he would suggest that the Bill should be committed pro forma on the following day, so that the House might know the alterations intended to be made.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would accede to the suggestion, but on Monday he should move that the Bill be referred to a Committee of ten Members, to be named by the Committee of Selection.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

RESOLUTION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [14th June].

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Rules sanctioned by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland on the 21st day of November, 1863, are, so far as regards their operation on the aid afforded to Convent and Monastic Schools, at variance with the principles of the system of National Education." — (Sir Hugh Cairns.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he trusted it would be unnecessary for him to remind the House of the condition in which the Question stood. He regretted not to see the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) in his place, because having proposed a Question, he thought that he ought to have been present when it was called on. He (the O'Conor Don) did not propose to enter into the general subject of national education in Ireland. There was only one particular phase of the Question to which he would endeavour to confine his observations. At the outset he found a difficulty in understanding the object of the Resolution proposed by the hon. and learned Member. The Motion was—

"That in the opinion of this House the rules sanctioned by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland on the 21st day of November, 1863, are, so far as regards their operation on the aid afforded to convent and monastic schools, at variance with the principles of the system of National Education."

Meaning thereby of National Education as first established. But the House must bear in mind that the rules sanctioned by the Commissioners in November, 1863, were not any particular rules, but the general rules of the National Board. They comprised not only new rules, but all the rules that had at any time existed. But when he came to examine the speech of his hon. and learned Friend he found quite a different interpretation put upon the Resolution; and his hon. and learned Friend had assured the House that he had the support of several members of the National Board, such as Dr. Henry and the Bishop of Derry. But did his hon. and learned Friend mean to tell the House that he had the support of the Bishop of Derry in condemning all aid from the Board to convent and monastic schools? The Bishop of Derry said he became a Commissioner under the rules of 1855, but the Resolution before the House was equally condemnatory of the rules of 1855 as of the rules of 1863, and of all others. The hon. and learned Gentleman said it was contrary to the principle of National Education to grant aid to voluntary efforts.

He maintained, on the contrary, that the system was expressly designed by the Earl of Derby to aid and assist the voluntary efforts of the country. The hon. and learned Member's Resolution appeared to condemn the appointment of monitors, except in State schools, and to be opposed to help of any kind being given to conventual or monastic institutions. He was at issue with the hon. and learned Gentleman on both these points. A discussion took place at the outset on the question, whether these convent schools would come under the rules laid down by the Earl of Derby equally with all other schools. The result was that they received the same amount of aid, and in the same way as the ordinary schools, on compliance with the usual conditions. Up to 1839 the grants were given by way of capitation on the number of pupils on the rolls. It was then thought desirable to alter the mode of allocation; but no alteration took place in the principle on which assistance was given. It was discovered that some of the school teachers were very incompetent, and it was determined that the teachers should be classified, and a higher amount paid according to the classification. There existed, however, some schools to which it was unnecessary to apply the classification. There was, he maintained, no essential principle altered in the alteration which had been made in 1839. If the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member applied to all aid given to convent and monastic schools, it was one which the House could not adopt. It was, however, perhaps to the conjunction of the establishment of monitors and of additional assistance being granted to those schools that he objected; but if that were so, he could not see how, when taken separately, neither one nor the other was contrary to the principles of the system, they could fairly be said to be so when united. And from whom, he would ask, did those complaints against the alteration in the rules, which the hon. and learned Gentleman had urged, come? From the Presbyterians of the North of Ireland, who had shown themselves to be the friends of the system established by the Earl of Derby, by refusing to join the National Board until alterations were made which were an essential departure from the principles which that noble Lord had at the outset laid down. Nothing was more clearly expressed in Lord Stanley's letter than that in every school there should be combined both secular and religious instruction ; that, on a certain day in each week, and at a certain hour, time should be devoted to religious instruction ; and that the pastors belonging to the faith of the minority should have the right to enter the schools in order to teach the children of their own flock. Yet these vital principles had been departed from by the clients of the hon. and learned Gentleman himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman was, in short, the spokesman of that very party which had brought the National system into that state of disrepute in which it was at present placed, and it seemed to him, he must confess, somewhat extraordinary that, having gained all the privileges which they had claimed for themselves, the Presbyterians of Ulster should come forward and object to any sort of additional aid being given to the schools of other denominations. Now, he was at once prepared to admit that if the convent schools were not satisfactorily conducted, any rule which had for its object to extend aid to them ought not to receive the sanction of the House. But the hon. and learned Gentleman himself had stated at the commencement of his speech that he was ready to acknowledge that these schools were conducted in a satisfactory manner in many instances, although that view did not appear to be quite consistent with that which he had enunciated before he sat down. Indeed, the hon. and learned Gentleman had devoted more than half of his speech to running down these establishments. He asked the House to believe that the teachers in them were inefficient, and that it would be a great error to extend to them any further assistance. Those statements the hon. and learned Gentleman based on the Report of one of the Inspectors—Mr. Sheridan ; the only Report, so far as he (the O'Connor Don) could see, which he could find to bear out his views. The fact, however, was, that Mr. Sheridan passed his judgment on those schools before inspecting them ; and what, he would ask, were the charges which he made ? They were shortly as follows :—That the teachers did not possess a technical knowledge of the method of teaching ; that through their over-impatience of competition they destroyed other schools in the districts in which they were established ; that, in consequence, the population in those districts were to a certain extent inadequately supplied with the means of receiving education ; and that, in consequence of the competition and the overcrowding of children in the schools, there was not sufficient teaching power in proportion to the number to be taught, and the education was of a very inferior description. Such were the three charges which were brought against the convent schools by Mr. Sheridan. It must be recollected that Mr. Sheridan had not inspected these schools himself. Now, with respect to the first charge, the want of a technical knowledge of the method of teaching, he should like to refer to the Report of Inspector Sheehy, of the Cork district, who said that success in teaching depended chiefly on practice and a thorough knowledge of the subject taught. If the teachers read well, wrote well, and spelt well, they would produce infinitely better scholars than those who, while possessing technical knowledge, were deficient in the higher qualities of teachers. Mr. Sheridan stated that the convent schools showed great impatience of competition, so that the ordinary schools were shut up, and the population left without adequate means of instruction, and he named Killarney as an instance. But, on referring to the Reports of the Killarney district Inspector himself, he found that that statement of Mr. Sheridan was far from being borne out. In fact, it appeared that the number of schools was quite adequate to the wants of the district. The third charge brought by Mr. Sheridan against the convent schools was, that the teaching was inefficient. But he found in the Reports that the Inspectors over and over again complained that reading, writing, and the other branches of education were taught badly in the ordinary schools, and whenever any particular school was pointed out as excellent, it was sure to be either a convent school, a model school, or one of the workhouse schools. Therefore, without going outside the four corners of the Report made by Inspector Sheridan, it could be shown that the charges which he brought were not borne out by the reports which he himself had received. A Report had been made by Inspector Mahony, in which he said that while in the ordinary schools the poorer classes had to pay at the rate of 2s. 9d. for each child, in the convent schools they had to pay only 11d. Mr. Mahony looked upon that relief to the poorer classes as a disadvantage, because he found that though at those convent schools the attendance of the children was 60 per cent as compared with 51 per cent at the ordinary schools, yet at some convent schools, where the payment was more regularly enforced, the attendance was 80 per cent. Now, as to the question of cost, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Hugh Cairns) had made use of an argument which, if examined, would be found not to warrant the conclusion drawn from it. It appeared from the Report of the Commissioners that the total cost of the education of a child in the convent schools was something like 7s., whereas in the ordinary schools it was 14s. Inspector Sheridan stated that the great majority of the children in the convent schools never reached the higher classes, and therefore the hon. and learned Gentleman concluded that 4s. 6d., or, correcting his estimate as it should have been, 7s. a child was paid for half education. But, in order to prove his case, the hon. and learned Gentleman should have proved that a better education was obtained at the higher cost, or, he should have proved that the children in the ordinary schools were more than half educated. But, according to Inspector Sheridan, the State was paying 7s. a head for half education in the convent schools, and 14s. for something less than quarter education in the ordinary schools. That was exactly what resulted from the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument, because it appeared that only 18 or 19 per cent of the children in the ordinary schools reached the higher classes. And what was the remedy proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman? He objected to the new rule on the ground that it would favour the convent as distinguished from the model or training schools. But what was the cost of educating children in the model schools? According to the Report of the Education Commissioners it was no less than £1 16s. 6d. per head, so that the hon. and learned Gentleman wanted to have the children educated in the higher class of schools at that enormous expense.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

THE O'CONOR DON resumed: He would, therefore, ask the House, whether it was prepared to condemn schools which gave education at a cheap rate, and which the people of the country favoured from religious motives? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin objected to the convent and monastic schools because they had a religious tendency, and were consequently in contradiction to the spirit of the system adopted by the Board. If so, then it must be admitted that the system of education established by the Board was an irreligious education. But Lord Stanley's letter laid it down that religious as well as secular instruction should be given in the schools. Under all these circumstances, he could not conceive what argument could be urged against the rules recognized in 1863, on the ground of the aid afforded to convent and monastic schools. The hon. Member for the King's County intended to move the omission from the Motion of the words referring to convent and monastic schools, so that the Motion would then declare that the rules sanctioned by the Commissioners on the 21st of November, 1863, were at variance with the principles of the system of National Education. He admitted that there were among the rules some, introduced at the instance of the Presbyterians of Ulster, which were contrary to the principle contained in Lord Stanley's letter; but he thought that a general Resolution, such as the hon. Member for the King's County desired, rather dangerous for the House to adopt, and it would have been better if the hon. Member had stated in his Amendment what were the particular rules which were objectionable. On various occasions he had stated his views respecting the general principle of education which he would wish to see adopted. The principle established by Lord Stanley's letter had failed to meet the views of all the parties in the country, and had in practice broken down, and he would be ready to support a system for Ireland similar to the one existing in England, if he saw the means of establishing it there. He could not, however, support the Resolution moved by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, because it was opposed to the principle laid down by Lord Stanley's letter. He had no hesitation in voting against the hon. and learned Gentleman's Motion, and as to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite he should prefer before deciding to hear his explanation of it. He agreed with him that there had been departures from the rules, but he should like to hear at what departures his hon. and learned Friend pointed, for the hon. and learned Member for Belfast had the other evening mentioned departures from the rules which he believed could not be so characterized.

MR. BLACK said, that in times past there had been much discussion in Scotland on the subject of education, and they had arrived at the conclusion that the system of National Education which had been adopted in Ireland was infinitely better than that which existed in England. The English system was disliked in Scotland because it was sectarian, and they hailed Lord Stanley's scheme because it had a tendency to tone down religious animosities, and to bring up children of different sects together, so that they might learn to love and respect each other. It seemed, however, that for thirty years they had been under a delusion in thinking thus of Lord Stanley's system, for they were now told that the system in Ireland was in a great measure sectarian. Some blame had been thrown upon the Presbyterians, as though they were the first to try to break down the unsectarian system; and, if they had done so, he must say that they were wrong. All he asked was, that fair play should be given to Presbyterian and Roman Catholic alike, and that the spirit of Lord Stanley's proposals in that respect should be adhered to. It was obvious that one of the fundamental rules of that system—that no minister of religion or member of a religious order should be a teacher in one of those schools—had been departed from. We have been told that in the model schools the instruction was of the very best description, and that the pupils were there made effective teachers; but we have reason to believe that the priesthood in Ireland have denounced these model schools, and have done their best to prevent them being well attended. The percentage of Roman Catholics attending all the National schools in Ireland was eighty-one, whilst the percentage of Roman Catholics attending the model schools was only forty-three. It was plain, therefore, that some means must be used to discourage attendance at the model schools. He could easily conceive that in convent schools young ladies of earnest minds, who had renounced the world and devoted themselves to doing good to their fellow creatures, made zealous and kind teachers; but the question was not whether these ladies taught well or ill, but whether there had been a departure from the fundamental principle upon which the National schools were originally founded; and the hon. and learned Member for Belfast had proved this beyond a doubt. The system which the country wanted was that which had been established by the Earl of Derby when Lord Stanley; and that system could be carried out if those who had the management of it only acted honestly, and did not give any one sect an advantage over the others. The other schoolmistresses were required to have been trained in a model school or to have passed an examination; but these conditions were dispensed with in the case of the nuns. He did not object to this advantage being given to them because they were nuns. He should object to it equally if it were granted to Presbyterians. The rule laid down by Lord Stanley was a good one, which in Scotland they were anxious to see carried out. Under it all schools were to be on the same footing—there was to be a common literary and a separate religious education. The experiment had been tried successfully in Edinburgh, where both Protestants and Roman Catholics were taught in the same school receiving secular instruction, sitting together on the same benches, and receiving religious instruction, and reading the New Testament, under teachers of their own faith in separate rooms. So long as the system was carried out honestly it would succeed, but if either party attempted to secure advantages for itself the system would break down. They ought to take their stand on the rules, and not allow them to be broken through; but if pupil-teachers were to be trained under nuns they would have all the feelings of the "nunnery" about them, and would not act in training children upon the same principles, and with the same unbiassed sympathies, as the teachers brought up in model schools under persons not confined to one sect. Now, it was not because the deviation was allowed to Roman Catholics that he offered objections; he would lay down the same if Protestants sought it. If the Government has already yielded to pressure from without it ought to go no further in this direction, and for that reason he should support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast.

MR. HENNESSY said, that the hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland told them the other evening that the present agitation was an attack on the system of National Education in Ireland. If so, by whom was it made? From the papers laid on the table he gathered that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary was one of the leading promoters of the attack. [Sir ROBERT PEEL: No!] The right hon. Gentleman in a letter dated the 30th of January, 1864, said—

“The attention of the Irish Government has been drawn to certain contemplated changes in the fundamental rules of the system of National Education in Ireland, the effects of which will be seriously to imperil the principle upon which the system is based.”

And the right hon. Gentleman added that the Bill had “no power to change any fundamental rule without the express permission of his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant.” It was a remarkable fact that on the preceding day, the 29th of January, language almost identical was used by Dr. Henry, a member of the Board and President of Queen’s College, Belfast, who expressed his opinion that “the recent changes of rule seriously interfere with one of the fundamental principles on which the system of National Education was founded,” and desired that his solemn protest should be communicated to the Government. He presumed that the protest had been communicated, and the next day it was followed by the letter of the right hon. Gentleman. It also appeared that a deputation on the subject waited on the Lord Lieutenant, headed by the Protestant Bishop of Down and Connor; and among those who entered protests were the Bishop of Derry and Mr. Gibson, who was also a member of the Board. These were the gentlemen who promoted the attack, and every one of them, with the exception of the Chief Secretary, was a member of the Whig party. The two bishops were both stout Whigs, and Dr. Henry and Mr. Gibson were tried servants and consistent placemen of the same party. The present assault on the Government system was made, therefore, by the supporters of the Government in Ireland. It was not, however, the first time that the institution had been attacked in that Parliament. In 1859 the Roman Catholic Members raised an opposition to it, and in the same year the Roman Catholic Bishops published a pastoral against it, and recommended that the English system should be adopted in Ireland. Dr. Henry and Mr. Gibson, to whose protests he had referred, were leading members of the Presbyterian party, for whom the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) also spoke; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside), who might be regarded as the representative of the Established Church, had on more than one occasion attacked the system. Thus, then, the three denominations were arrayed against the institution of National Education in Ireland. In England the system which prevailed was satisfactory to the various religious parties. Why should the reverse be the case with the system in Ireland? It was because the principle adopted in England was different from that in Ireland. The recent attack on the Irish system was of great importance, because it disclosed among the opponents not merely adherents of the three denominations, but even members of the Board. The fact was that the Board was divided against itself, and one section was fighting the other. The Motion set forth that the rules sanctioned on the 21st of November, 1863, were, as far as regarded their operation on the aid afforded to convent and monastic schools, “at variance with the principles of the system of National Education.” What was an Irish Catholic gentleman to say to that assertion? He was bound, on consideration, to say that he believed the rules were at variance with the principles of National Education. He was also of opinion that they were most unjustly oppressive to convent and monastic schools. The Attorney General said that those institutions received aid like other schools. That was not the fact.

MR. O’HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) denied that he had ever said anything of the sort. He distinctly explained the difference as to the subvention in the case of convent and other schools.

MR. HENNESSY said, he did not refer to the subvention. The point to which he desired to draw attention was that, while the promoters of an ordinary National school might establish another in the same town, and receive aid for both, there was a rule of the Board which provided that one school only attached to any conventual community should receive aid. In England, if there were two schools connected with a convent both would receive aid. Thus, in Blandford Square, there was a community of nuns with two convent schools attached, both of which received aid. In Ireland, only one in connection with any single community would be assisted. Thus in Limerick the Sisters of Mercy had several well-conducted schools, but they only received a grant for one.

MR. MONSELL said, that was a mistake, for aid was given by the National Board to several schools of the Sisters of Mercy at Limerick.

MR. HENNESSY: Not of the same community.

MR. MONSELL: Yes; of the Sisters of Mercy.

MR. HENNESSY: The Report of the National Board did not corroborate what the right hon. Gentleman said. He did not, however, deny that such a rule was in existence.

MR. MONSELL: I am aware of this particular rule, but it does happen that in Limerick the Sisters of the same community have several schools, and receive assistance.

MR. HENNESSY: The rule told them one thing, the blue-book told them another thing, and the practice told them another thing. The practice of the Board was at variance with their own rules.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he would beg leave to put the hon. Member right on that point.

MR. HENNESSY said, he thought it would be better for the right hon. Gentleman to explain after he had concluded his remarks. The rule, he believed, existed, and if so, only one school in connection with one community could receive Government aid. That was the rule passed in 1855, and he thought it would be found to be as he had stated. But there were other rules which struck mainly at convent schools. One was that the children should not make the sign of the cross, and another rule was that no crucifixes, no religious pictures or emblems of religion, should be exhibited in the school in school hours. Was it possible that such rules should be enforced in a convent? Speaking as a Catholic, he said it was utterly impossible to do so, and it would be unwise for any Government to attempt to enforce them. At a late meeting in Dublin, presided over by the Lord Mayor, and attended, among others, by the Bishop of Salda, the Rev. Mr. Kirby said that a certain individual had visited a school in Cork kept by the good Sisters of the Presentation Convent, but under the Board of National Education. The children had been taught to make the sign of the cross whenever the clock struck, but the nuns told the children not to make the sign while the visitor was present, he being an Inspector of the National Board. When the clock struck, however, the custom overcame the injunction, the tiny hand of every child in the school was raised, and the sacred sign was made, while the poor nuns were filled with trepidation. The fact was that ladies who devoted their lives to the service of God could not be tied down by such straight-laced rules. A French abbé, who, upon a recent visit to Ireland, noticed the rule of the Board, that no crucifixes or religious pictures should be exhibited, said—

"However, in many of the schools I visited, these objects are kept in a little recess in the wall at the end of the room, and are hidden by a curtain."

Here were ladies bound by religious vows, and performing religious duties, and it was attempted to make them hypocrites. The fact was that the Board of Education, anxious to conciliate the multitude of its enemies in Ireland, was willing to make concessions to all parties, under a false impression that by doing so the Catholic party could be conciliated. Now, the one thing which would satisfy Catholics was the same justice that they received in England. He agreed that there was not a mixed but a separate education in the convent schools, and he did not expect that a zealous Protestant or Presbyterian would consent to send his children to those schools. On the other hand, assuming a convent school and a common National school to be not far from each other, a Catholic would prefer to send his children to a convent school. But if it were true that the aid given to convent schools was opposed to the whole system of mixed education, why, it might be asked, should he not agree to the Resolution? He sought, however, by his Amendment, to make the Resolution a general one. He would declare the opinion of the House to be that the rules sanctioned by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland on the 21st day of November, 1863, were at variance with the principles of the system of National Education, instead of saying that these rules were only at variance "so far as regards their operation on the aid afforded to convent and monastic schools." He, and those who thought with him, desired to mark their sense of the fact, that owing to the changes which had taken place in the system of National Education in Ireland, all its vital principles had altered. In 1840, one of these changes attracted the attention of the Catholic Bishops in Ireland, and was commented upon in another place by Lord Derby so lately as 1858. In 1834, a rule was issued, securing to the clergy liberty to assemble the children in the schoolroom, if they saw fit, for purposes of religious instruction. That rule was acted upon for many years, the Board providing that one day in the week should be given for religious instruction, and various parish priests regularly assembled their children in the schoolroom. In 1840, however, a serious change was made by the adoption of a rule to the effect, that the patron of a school might prevent any clergyman from giving religious instruction in the schoolroom—a rule which drew from the Earl of Derby an expression of regret that in the great bulk of the schools, contrary to the intention of those who had proposed the National system, there was not only no religious education given, but no facilities were afforded for separate religious instruction by the ministers of different persuasions out of school hours. According to the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Carlisle before the Commons' Committee of 1837, the Board itself had no power to alter the original rule, and yet three years afterwards it was changed, he presumed with the sanction of the Government of the day. The Rev. Mr. Trench explained how the alteration was introduced. He stated that his sole objection to joining the Board was the rule which allowed Roman Catholic priests to go into the schools to teach error, but he added that when that point was conceded to the Presbyterians in 1840, and the rule altered, the Board saying they would be satisfied if children were permitted to go to their respective teachers elsewhere, his objection to the system was at once removed. In 1847, the Roman Catholic Bishops met, and passed the following Resolution:—

"That notwithstanding the explanations so kindly given, we are still of opinion that the changes introduced in the National System of Education are most serious and dangerous, and incompatible with the safety of the religious principles of our Catholic children."

It thus appeared that two important rules had been altered, and that the present system was different from that established by the Earl of Derby. There was a third variation to which he would ask the attention of the Government. When the system was first established, the Earl of Derby said it was of vital importance that it should command the confidence of the Roman Catholic bishops and priests, and that it should exclude even the shadow of proselytism. Accordingly, it was provided that when a clergyman of any denomination chose to give religious instruction, he should tell the children of other denominations to retire from the school, unless their parents had specially directed them to attend. The Presbyterians, however, declined to be guilty of what they thought the sin of driving Roman Catholic children from the school when they were about to teach the Word of God, and they would not join the Board till the rule was altered. At that time, however—1833—the Board was firm, and the Rev. Mr. Love, a Presbyterian minister, was informed that the Holy Scriptures might be read in his school, provided that such children only as were directed by their parents to attend were allowed to continue in the school. Before the Committee of 1837, the Rev. Mr. Carlisle and Mr. Blake, both members of the Board, gave important evidence on that point. The latter said he considered it particularly necessary that the rules should require the approbation of the parents, for otherwise tricks might be played, perhaps on both sides; and he added that he should not regard the absence of dissent on the part of the parents as a sufficient justification for allowing their children to receive religious instruction from the clergyman of another denomination. Nevertheless, in 1855, the following rule was published by the Board:—

"Patrons, managers, and teachers, are not required to exclude any children from any religious instruction given in the school; but all children are to have full power to absent themselves, or to withdraw from it."

It would thus be seen that while the old rule compelled children of other denominations to leave the school when religious instruction was about to be given by a Protestant or Roman Catholic clergyman, as the case might be, the new rule merely provided that they should not be forced to remain. Archdeacon Stopford, when examined before the Lords' Committee in 1854, frankly stated that the rule was altered to meet the views of his party, those views being that it would devolve on the parent to withdraw his child, and that he would not claim the right of having the child told by others to leave the school. Mr. M'Creedy, one of the head Inspectors at the time, told the same Committee that the modification of the rule had generally satisfied the Protestants, at whose instance it was made; but that he did not think it was perfectly satisfactory to some Roman Catholics. The effect of the change was stated by Archdeacon Stopford, when he said that all the children in his National schools, of whatever religious persuasion they might be, attended the religious instruction as they did any other lesson. Dr. Henry a member of the Board, stated that in many parts of the North of Ireland, the Roman Catholic children read the Scriptures with the Protestants and Presbyterians; and, in fact, at the present moment, there were great numbers of Roman Catholic children receiving a Protestant education in National schools. He might be told by the Chief Secretary, that a notice was given to parents before their children were taught by a clergyman of a different denomination, but that notice, according to the words of Inspector Keenan, an able officer of the National Board, was a sham, and had no effect whatever. One would have thought that the National Board would have been satisfied with what had been done. They had destroyed their system in the case of convent schools. They had destroyed their system in order to obtain the support of the Presbyterian party. The Commissioners, however, had granted a concession at the instance of the Presbyterians, and had allowed their fourteen class books to be interwoven with religious teaching. Mr. Carlisle, a Presbyterian member of the Board, in a letter which he was injudicious enough to write to The Times in 1854, said upon that subject—

"This concession considerably altered the original proposed system. It rendered it, instead of being a rigid system of exclusion of all religion from the common education of the people, an experiment how far Roman Catholics and Protestants could proceed together with perfect unanimity in introducing Scriptural light among the population generally, an experiment the most interesting and important, but the most delicate and difficult ever intrusted to any Commission."

Now, of the fourteen literary books used by the children by the direction of the Board, he believed thirteen to have been written by English or Scotch Protestants, and one only by an Irishman, who was also a Protestant. These books were imbued, he did not say it offensively, because he thought it was but natural under the circumstances, with a strong anti-Catholic, and, he might also add, with an anti-Irish spirit. As an instance of the latter fact, he might mention the circumstance that Irish children were called upon to sing a hymn, one of the lines of which ran—

"And thus I am a happy English child."

That was a sentiment that Irish children did not approve, and they ought not to be called upon to sing it. They might say with much more reason—

"We are unhappy Irish children."

He believed that there occurred in the same hymn a delicate reference to the fact that—

"We do not worship stocks and stones."

The fact was, of course, true enough, but every one was aware of the meaning which the phrase was intended to convey. He would contrast the practice pursued by the National Board with that followed by the Committee of Council in England. The National Board had refused to sanction the use of the schoolbooks written by the Christian Brothers in Ireland, a number of Irish Catholics who had devoted themselves to the education of the people, and who in furtherance of that object had written some excellent educational works. The House would find, however, that every one of these publications were in use in England, not only in the Catholic schools, but that they were also largely ordered for use in the English Wesleyan schools. And yet these books, written by Irishmen and largely used in England, were excluded from the list of school works in Ireland by the National Board. He anticipated that when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland rose that evening he would be prepared to withdraw his letter of January, 1864. [Cries of No, no!] It must strike English Members with surprise to find that so much of the public money was lavishly expended every year upon education in Ireland, when the system adopted had met with so much opposition in that country. The rules had been attacked by the Catholic party, and the Church and the Presbyterian parties had alike denounced them. He appealed to the House whether it were politic or just to force upon the people of Ireland a system of education, which the three great denominations in the country disapproved. Did the House deem it prudent to expend hundreds of thousands a year for the benefit of Ireland in a manner opposed to the wishes of the people themselves? The practice in this country was to educate the people in accordance with the wishes of the various denominations to which they belonged, and that was precisely the principle which Ireland had demanded, and which she had been refused. The time, however, was approaching when that demand would be granted. Although the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland defended the system, it was only the other night that he dealt it a deadly blow. Baron Deasy, who formerly filled the same office as the right hon. Gentleman, spoke of the system as one of united education; but the right hon. Gentleman said that, however loudly agitators might talk of a united education, no such thing practically existed in Ireland. He would therefore conclude by moving, as an Amendment, the omission of the words which confined the expression of opinion upon the rules to their operation on the aid afforded to convent and monastic schools.

MR. BLAKE, in seconding the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the King's County, fully concurred in everything that had fallen from him, except the latter portion of his speech, where he expressed fears that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would withdraw the opinion contained in his letter to the Education Commissioners. However he differed in many things from the right hon. Baronet, he had a better opinion of him than to apprehend he would do anything of the kind, because whatever his faults were—and he had not then the least intention of charging him with any retraction of what he avowed, or playing the hypocrite to his opinions, whether right or wrong—the habit of retraction could not be included amongst them. He congratulated his hon. and learned Friend for the bold and straightforward course he had adopted in moving the Amendment. It was better that the truth should be admitted, and that every man should declare his opinions and the course he would take on this most important question. He was prepared to do both, and would lay in plain terms before the House what he believed to be the real facts of the case, and his own reasons for his change of opinions, and the course which he had taken, and would adhere to, on the Education question. He was for denominational grants and for combined religious and secular education, which necessarily involved the separate system, which he sincerely believed was best to insure sound moral training, which was a consideration of the greatest importance; and he had no doubt pupils would acquire worldly knowledge all the better for the combination, and in order to accomplish what sincere religionists on both sides rightly desired—the power to educate their youth in the manner they deemed best calculated to promote their temporal and eternal welfare—he thought it better that the truth should be neither concealed nor evaded; and he, for one, declared his belief, notwithstanding all the logic and eloquence of the Attorney General in attempting to prove the contrary, that the separate system was really in operation in nearly every successful school under the Board, excepting of course the model schools, which were not successful; and he made this avowal in order that the House might see the utter uselessness of expecting that any other system would succeed, and assist to compel the Government to do that which they must do sooner or later—sanction the denominational system in all its integrity, and thus put an end to subterfuge and dissension. Theoretically, National Education in Ireland was on the mixed system, but practically it was denominational, and if it were not so the Commissioners would have very slender returns to show as to the number of their pupils. Attending the schools were upwards of three hundred thousand Roman Catholics, sixty-four thousand Presbyterians, and about thirty-nine thousand Protestants. Now, he dared to assert that if the National system was carried out in its full integrity as originally established by Lord Stanley, there would not be one quarter of any of these religious denominations attending the schools. [“No, no !”] Well, he would give them the best proof of it, but would first define the main principle which Lord Stanley laid down as the one which was to guide the administration of the system, and that was, that the religious element should be entirely eliminated from the instruction and conduct of the schools, and that a secular instruction, bare of religion, was to be rigorously pursued. Now, could the Attorney General for Ireland honestly say that such a system was everywhere carried out in its integrity? He was quite sure the right hon. Gentleman could not. Wherever there was a Catholic patron of a school, and they were usually the Catholic clergy, they, of course, appointed the most zealous Roman Catholics they could get, provided they were otherwise competent; and, no doubt, the Protestant clergymen or landlords provided staunch Protestant masters in their schools. Now, amongst the other duties imposed by the patrons on the teachers they appointed was to give their pupils religious instruction at the times allowed, and very faithfully they performed that task. He had often visited schools, and found the masters and mistresses explaining the sacred Scriptures, teaching catechism, or engaged in prayers with the children, and a very edifying and gratifying sight it was. Now, he asked hon. Gentlemen, was it rational to suppose that the teachers who thus gave religious instruction at one period of the day could so completely disavow themselves at another from their religious bias and feelings as not to tincture their secular instruction with it more or less? He believed such to be a moral impossibility; and the sooner the fruitless attempt at restraining them from obeying their natural and legitimate impulse to give a religious colour to their teachings the better. Some of the Commissioners had tried their hands at writing books of instruction for the pupils which should not trench on their religious belief or prejudices. He would not deny but that they had intended to discharge their task honestly; but the strong and just complaints which the Catholic bishops and clergy made against many of these books, proved it was impossible for any man having a religious belief to write on even the most ordinary topics in a strictly neutral spirit. When such was the fact, would it not be infinitely better not to attempt to place a curb on the introduction into the educational system, without which it was necessarily poor and imperfect; and instead of the system of repression, evasion, subterfuge, and angry recrimination which was perpetually going on, would it not be infinitely better for the sake of peace, as well as the interests of the pupils, to leave to each denomination their own people in conformity with their religious views, the Government reserving to itself sufficient control to insure secular instruction being properly carried out? He could bring forward no better proof of the fact of the denominational system being practically in existence than the failure to carry out the mixed system in its full integrity in the model schools. There were, he believed, upwards of twenty of these schools in operation. It would be tedious to give an account of each of these schools; but he would adopt the one he was best acquainted with, that at the city he represented—Waterford—which would afford a very good illustration of the entire. Nevertheless, the fact was that this school had failed, because it was not denominational, and was carried out on the mixed principle, and no doubt consistently with that, had been honestly and impartially conducted. There were many favourable circumstances about the school calculated to make it a success. Excellent masters and mistresses had been appointed; there was every appliance for instruction, which was of the best kind for the class for whom it was intended; and no attempt, so far as he had heard, had ever been made at proselytism. But the greater portion of the Catholic and Protestant clergy were opposed to it, not being allowed to have any voice in its management. The Roman Catholic Bishop, a most learned and zealous prelate, discountenanced it, as he felt he could not give his approval to an institution in which he was precluded from exercising any control over the appointment of the teachers, the selection of the books, and the course of instruction; and he therefore forbade his flock from sending their children, which behest was almost universally obeyed. The right rev. Dr. Daly, the Protestant Bishop of Cashel, equally earnest in his own way, discountenanced the school because the Scriptures were not allowed to be read there. So that, owing to the opposition coming from honest and zealous men, (though entertaining very opposite views on religion,) this school, in point of obtaining the number of pupils contemplated, had undoubtedly failed. Elsewhere the Catholic prelates had discountenanced the model schools in their dioceses, and with the same result as at Waterford; and latterly, he believed, they directed their clergy not to appoint masters to the schools in their parishes who had been trained in them. The Catholic bishops unquestionably had it in their power to prevent the mixed system being extended to those over whom they had ecclesiastical control, and it was equally manifest that they were resolved to exercise that power, believing, as they did, that they were bound to do so. And the Protestant clergy, on the other hand, were equally determined, unless the Protestant version of the Scriptures were read in the schools, to discountenance them. Each side, if they believed themselves right, ought to act on their convictions. For his own part, he sided with those who were for having religion as far as was practicable and judicious interwoven with nearly every kind of instruction. The bishops and clergy of the Catholic Church in Ireland had taken their stand on the question of the denominational system against the mixed system, and would undoubtedly have their flocks with them—for one, he certainly would take the side of the hierarchy of his Church in a matter which they were best entitled and qualified to pronounce. The great majority of the Protestants and Presbyterians also wished to educate their co-religionists their own way. It was, therefore, difficult to understand why the Government resisted what was manifestly the desire of the great majority of the Irish people of every denomination. When separate grants were not only given in England, but that subsidy would not be given to a mixed school, and that it was absolutely necessary for a school to belong exclusively to some known religious denomination before it could obtain assistance from the State, it was incomprehensible why the very opposite practice should be pursued in Ireland, where religious feeling on the part of Catholics was much stronger, and where, unhappily, no religious animosities were much more bitter. It would probably be urged, that if the denominational system was sanctioned by law that many poor children would be left without education, as in many districts of the North of Ireland the population were almost wholly Presbyterian, and in the county Derry Protestants, and that there would not be numbers enough for exclusively Catholic schools, so that Catholic children should go to the Protestant or Presbyterian denominational schools, or remain uneducated; whilst, on the other hand, Protestants would be subject to the same inconvenience in the southern and western provinces, where they were thinly scattered about. It must be freely admitted that such inconveniences would occur, and that some Catholic and Protestant children would be placed at a disadvantage; but the numbers who would thus suffer would be very few indeed in comparison to the thousands upon thousands who would be benefited by having a sound religious education combined with the secular one; and in this, as in all other cases, it was the advantage of the vast majority which should be looked to. Besides, he thought arrangements might be made by which Protestant or Catholic children might receive secular instruction from the master or monitor where they were too few to have a distinct school of their own. In conclusion, he repeated his belief that not only had the fundamental principles on which the National system was founded been violated in favour of Catholics, Protestants, and Presbyterians, but that if it had not been done, the Commissioners might shut up their schools. In order to keep up the number on their rolls, they had to make concessions to all parties in violation of the principles laid down by Lord Stanley. Wherever that principle was sought to be maintained the schools had failed. When, therefore, everyone knows that monastic and convent schools, and also those having Catholic and Protestant patrons in connection with the Board, were virtually denominational, why, in the name of candour and common sense, not let them become to all intents and purposes so? For all parties concerned it would be the best course. As things stood now, the Board of Education, patrons of schools, and the officers connected with them, were all in a false position. The whole affair bore a sort of half fish half flesh character, that was not pleasant; and certainly the angry debates which it provoked in that House were neither agreeable nor creditable, and no good purpose could be served by recriminations and charges and counter charges as to concessions made to convents or Presbyterian schools. No one knew better than the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the fundamental rules of the Board had been violated, or he would not have written the following very remarkable letter:—

“Sir,—The attention of the Irish Government has been drawn to certain contemplated changes in the fundamental rules of the system of National Education in Ireland, the effects of which will be seriously to imperil the principle upon which the system is based; and I am to remind you, as Resident Commissioner, that the Board of Commissioners, as incorporated by Royal Charter, has no power to change any fundamental rule without the express permission of His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant.

“I am, &c.

Now to withdraw from the statement which, as a Minister of the Crown, he could not have made without reflection, he hoped, for his consistency sake, he would not attempt to do, but would follow it up by voting in the same division with him on the Amendment which he had seconded. He hoped all parties who felt with him (Mr. Blake) in this matter would continue to press on Government the necessity of conceding to the wishes of the great bulk of the Irish people in the matter, and allow every denomination to educate their youth in the manner which would make good Christians, at the same time that they acquired scholastic knowledge under a right system. Both ought to go hand in hand together. He earnestly trusted, as one anxious for the advancement of his country and willing to concede to every other creed what he claimed for his own, that whether under this or another Ministry, a system of education for the poorer classes in Ireland would obtain the sanction of Parliament, more acceptable to the wishes of the people and more suited to the peculiar circumstances and wants of the country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words "so far as regards their operation on the aid afforded to Convent and Monastic Schools."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR ROBERT PEEL: After the direct appeal that has been made to me, it is necessary that I should address a few remarks to the House, and I think before I conclude I shall be able to convince the two hon. Gentlemen who have last addressed us, that the letter which has been so frequently referred to was not altogether unjustifiable. Before going to that particular subject, I am anxious to allude to one or two remarks which fell from the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Hennessy). I have often heard him make good speeches in this House, but I do not think his speech on this occasion was worthy of him. The National system during its existence has had many difficulties to encounter and many fiery trials to go through. It has had antagonists from all quarters; but I rejoice to think that it still works for good, when I know that there are more than 6,000 schools in operation, with an average number of children on the rolls for the year of more than half a million. Therefore, I think that no one will be inclined to give his assent to the sentiment of the hon. and learned Gentleman, when he almost rejoiced that the National system was, as he said, upon its last legs. That is not the belief I entertain. It is true that since 1831, when the Whigs of that day to their immortal credit established the system which now prevails—no doubt since then, many changes have been made in the rules and regulations of this National institution, but deliberately in every instance with the approval of the Government of the day. But, referring immediately to the question before us, I must, in the first instance, notice the remarkable speech of my right hon. Colleague the Attorney General for Ireland. But if I am desirous of supplementing the remarks which he then made, it is not for the purpose of being hypocritical—as the hon. Gentleman said I would not be—in regard to the opinions I entertain, but to show that my right hon. Friend and myself hold identically the same views on this subject. The principal reason then why I wish to address the House is first of all to show that the letter which I, as Chief Secretary for Ireland, sent to the Resident Commissioner, does not imply that there is that very great difference of opinion which some have inferred, and in the next place to express again in this House, as I have done on former occasions when the system has been here attacked, my firm and abiding approval of the National system as established in Ireland, and which I now do after three years of close observation and experience of its working. Therefore, whatever minor, whatever partial differences of opinion may exist, or may be supposed by some to exist, as regards the rules and regulations of that great National institution, for my own part, speaking candidly and honestly, I say that if I have called in question anything connected with that institution, it has been solely from a desire to see it maintained in its integrity, and on the basis which its founders laid for the social regeneration of the country. I think the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) in his able speech rather misinterpreted, in common with some others, what fell from the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, thinking that the hon. and learned Member had attacked both the Commissioners as also the whole system of the convent schools. I listened attentively to the hon. and learned Member for Belfast's speech, and I did not understand him to cast any imputations upon the Commissioners. He spoke of them with praise, and, if I caught his meaning correctly, he did not impugn the motives which influenced them in the conduct they had pursued. Again, as regards the convent schools, he did not, as far as I can recollect, attack the convent schools which are prepared to abide by the rules; and therefore the hon. Member for Roscommon went too far in saying that he did.

THE O'CONOR DON: I never meant to imply that the hon. and learned Member for Belfast meant to attack convent schools, except so far as Mr. Sheridan's Report was concerned. I, however, hold that his Resolution in effect attacks all convent schools.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the fundamental alterations in the rules which were contemplated would strike at the root of the system and tend to raise a serious antagonism to it. The hon. and learned Member is not the only person in Ireland who has expressed the same opinion. First of all a very remarkable article in a London paper, the Daily News, attracted my attention. The writer, evidently a very able man, felt that the contemplated changes would affect the fundamental principle of the system. I do not, of course, wish to quote the whole article, but its aim was to show that encroachments are being made in the National system in favour of schools which offer gratuitous education to the poor, but which, as schools of a particular character, ought not to receive exclusive aid, because children of only one denomination attend them. That article was copied into a great many of the Irish papers, and previous to its appearance there had been strong protests against the contemplated changes from various denominations in Ireland, and from parties entitled to the greatest consideration. The hon. Gentleman has sneered at the Presbyterian body, a body which, at all events, has been conspicuous for moderation and for its loyalty, and which has certainly been instrumental in bringing about an improved state of things generally in the North of Ireland. It was therefore, I think, hardly worthy of the hon. Gentleman, whatever may be his own religious opinions, to sneer at and cast a slur upon that body. But while these regulations were in course of consideration, I, as Chief Secretary, received communications from certain of the members of the Board who dissented. I have in my hand a letter from one of those Commissioners—I mention this as a justification of the step I took as Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant in drawing the attention of the Resident Commissioner to what I believed was a source of dissent in the counsels of the National Board. The Bishop of Derry, one of the members of that Board, in a communication which I received from him, I may almost say officially, wrote—

"I deprecate the introduction of rules eminently calculated to sow the seeds of discord, and to subvert one of the noblest institutions of our land."

I received the protests of four distinguished men, including Dr. Henry and the other gentlemen mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, and, under the circumstances, I think I was bound, without expressing any opinion of my own, to direct the attention of the Resident Commissioner to the opinions of important individuals and bodies in Ireland. I am quite satisfied the course I adopted had the approval of my right hon. Colleague in the Irish Government, and certainly it was not disapproved by the Lord Lieutenant. Well, that letter was written on that account, and on that account only. There is no hypocrisy in it, no variance of opinion with others; it was written because I felt that important bodies, the Presbyterians and others, were objecting to the contemplated changes, as being, in their view, fundamental alterations of the system. The Presbytery of Derry passed a resolution to that effect, and a similar resolution came from the Presbytery of Belfast. The latter body also petitioned Parliament on the subject, distinctly alleging that they viewed with alarm the proposed change in the rules and regulations, as calculated to place the training of the future teachers of the Irish people in the hands of the religious orders of the Church of Rome. At a meeting of the Ulster National Education Association, the Bishop of Down and Connor also said he looked on the new rules as tending to effect a fundamental change in the system. In the face of all that, it was difficult for me to follow any other course than I did; and I think every impartial man in this House will see that I expressed no dissent from the opinions of my right hon. Colleague in writing that letter, but that as Chief Secretary I felt it my duty to lay before the Resident Commissioner the views entertained by the authorities I have mentioned.

A great deal has been said about the administration of the Board, and the hon. Member seemed to imply that it has been the root of much mischief in Ireland. When first established it was intended to take the place of the Kildare Place Society, which, no doubt, did an immense amount of good, and had 1,100 schools connected with it when it ceased to receive grants. But that society would not adopt the principle of combined secular education with religious instruction, and then the celebrated letter of Mr. Stanley appeared, which inaugurated a system that has, I must say, conferred great and substantial blessings upon Ireland. During the first twelve years of its existence that system received the sanction, not only of five successive Cabinets, but passed through the ordeal of three Select Committees of Parliament, one in 1835, and two in 1837. In the constitution of the Board, Mr. Stanley and the Government of that day endeavoured to embrace men of different denominations, men of high personal character and exalted station in the Church, but professing different religious principles. Dr. Whately, the late Archbishop of Dublin, acted upon it in perfect harmony with Dr. Murray, a distinguished Roman Catholic prelate. But it is wrong to imply with regard to the constitution of this Board that it cannot be changed. It has been changed. First of all it consisted of seven, then ten, then fifteen, and ultimately it was in 1860 increased to twenty members. But that increase to twenty did not, I admit, satisfy every one. The Cork Examiner, which ought to understand the feelings of the Roman Catholics, and represents the views of the Member for Dungarvan, candidly admits that it is not satisfied with a Board of twenty members, adding, however, that National schools are only tolerated because, under Roman Catholic patronage, the principles of the system are not carried out.

"In three provinces" says that journal, "it is very well known the system of mixed education does not exist; in nearly all the schools the Roman Catholic clergy have almost unlimited discretion as regards religious instruction; were it otherwise, the National system would be intolerable; it lives, in fact, upon the false pretence of being what it is not."

And Dr. Cullen distinctly stated last year that he would not be satisfied unless there were seventeen Roman Catholics and only three Protestants—five to one—on the Board. That shows there is still a great difference of opinion on the subject. Recently it has been said that a Board of three or five paid Commissioners would be better. That is not a new idea. I was myself very much impressed with the advantages of a paid Commission. When the Earl of Derby appointed the Board, he admitted the difficulty of calling upon its members to give their full attention to the business, and therefore he appointed one paid Commissioner, the Rev. J. Carlisle. Even Archbishop Whately, when a member of the Board, was in favour of that system. So was Mr. Cross, the secretary of the Board. Lord Eglinton also before a Committee of the Lords in 1854 advocated the payment of four paid Commissioners, who should be laymen and responsible to the Lord Lieutenant. All this shows that the idea of changing the constitution of the Board is not a novel one, and that those who advocate it do not imply blame on those distinguished persons who constitute it.

I have already remarked that the Board has had to encounter a great deal of opposition. Almost all the Protestant bishops in times gone by have attacked the system. Petitions were also presented against it signed by both clergy and laity; the Presbyterian body also, the Synod of Ulster, decidedly opposed the National system. In spite of all that, the system has worked well. The difficulties against which it has had to contend have been of no ordinary character, and I am sorry to think that even now, after the acknowledged benefits it has conferred, it is open to question. The principal charge against it now arises from the money that is given to these conventual establishments—that by these additional grants you are interfering with the model school system. No doubt you are. It must be admitted, however, the convent schools have, for the most part, done their work well. Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, members of the Established Church, all have been appointed to examine into the constitution of these schools, and I am bound to say frankly and fairly that the great majority of the Reports which will be laid on the table on Monday or Tuesday next, in accordance with the Motion of the hon. Member for Limerick, are most favourable to these convent schools. But then I say they are of a denominational character, and I should be sorry to see a strictly denominational policy pursued as regards these grants. I think if that course were adopted it would strike at the very root of the system. No doubt when the National system was introduced, in 1831, the Government of the day had to consider whether convent and monastic schools should be associated with the Board; and although they were unfavourably reported on in 1832 and 1833, it was decided that but for that they should be established in union with the Board. But certain exceptions were made. What I fear is that the grants now about to be given may affect the model school system, which is certainly wrapped up in the National system. From the 4th and 7th Reports you can see what advantages were expected to attend the working of model schools. Wherever there is a model school there you find the schools in immediate contiguity conducted on a very excellent system. Now, if you destroy the model schools you will give immense extension to the conventual system. I think there is a limit here beyond which you ought not to go. When the Board was established there were 42 convent and monk schools in connection with it. Their numbers have very considerably and rapidly increased of late. I believe there are as many as 145 attached to the Board at present. Last year the number was 133; the year before, 128. Now, although each convent establishment can only have one school in connection with this Board, there is, from the figures I have just given, a very considerable extension to the conventual system in connection with the Board which I think ought to be checked. I do not think it good for the country that an extension of that kind should take place, particularly if you affect the model schools. Now, a model school is for the purpose of preparing teachers and giving an example to the surrounding country of what a good teacher should be. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh observed that these model schools have been the subject of very serious attack on the part of the Roman Catholic Church. We must all regret that in Clonmel, Galway, and Limerick, in consequence of attacks on these establishments, Roman Catholic children have left the schools. That cannot be for the general good of the system, and I do hope, the times of strong religious animosity having passed away, these attacks on the National system will cease. We have heard to-night what takes place in Edinburgh, where there are schools in which Roman Catholic and Protestant children can meet together and in harmony learn the simple Scripture lessons they are taught, and why should not this be the case also in Ireland?

It is of the greatest possible importance that teachers should be educated on some fixed system—that they should have practical elementary instruction. Now if these convent schools send out a great number of pupil-teachers to become teachers of National schools, what I fear is that they may affect the teaching of the National schools. No doubt the instruction given by the nuns is of the kindest and most considerate description; the affection with which they treat the members of their community is fully acknowledged; but if you throw too much the education of teachers of the National schools into the hands of the conventual schools you will lower the standard of their teaching, and ultimately inflict a blow on the National system. What I hope to see carried out is a system of education such as exists in Bavaria and in Prussia, where the children of different denominations meet together, the Roman Catholic and Protestant ecclesiastics act in harmony, and no sectarian feelings are evolved. I speak in this way because I am a firm friend of united secular education. It has worked immense good in Ireland, and we ought, therefore, to be careful how we listen to attacks against the Board which has carried into execution the designs of the framers of so great a work. You must recollect that the Commissioners have a very difficult task to perform. Some persons say that they are ambitious, prone to make changes, and impatient of control and Government interference. I do not believe that. I am one of those who think that the Commissioners are not likely to make changes which will prejudicially affect the working of the system; and I think that it is but fair that the voices of those persons who approve the system should be raised in this House in praise of the ability and character of the members of the Board. We ought to recollect that they render gratuitous service. There is only one paid Commissioner, Mr. Macdonnell, who has been connected with the Board, I think, since 1837. My right hon. Friend the Attorney General spoke of that gentleman as a colleague at the Board and a personal friend. I have had three years' experience of this system in Ireland, and I wish to speak of him, as a public servant, in the sincerity of my mind and without any varnish whatever. Mr. Macdonnell, in managing this system, has an immense task to perform. He has the direct superintendence of more than 6,000 schools, which have over half a million of children on the rolls. He must always be at his office; he must never be absent from his duty, and he is almost overwhelmed by the responsibility which weighs upon him in the discharge of his duty. [An hon. MEMBER: Not a bit of it.] The hon. Gentleman says "Not a bit of it," but I venture to say that no one who knows that gentleman, and knows the zeal and spirit with which he discharges his duties, will deny that he is entitled to the gratitude of the country for what he has done. Then do not let us fall into any error as to the benefits and blessings which this system has produced in Ireland. I do not know that any higher eulogy can be pronounced upon the men who founded it than that they have by means of these 6,000 schools sown broadcast in Ireland opportunities of education which were before denied to the people, opportunities of obtaining instruction which they certainly had not before, and opportunities of sharpening that natural quickness of intellect which is so remarkable and which is so conspicuously displayed under the influence of this system. If that is what the National system has done in Ireland, I hope that the House will not agree to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Belfast, because I believe that convent schools are a part of that system. They have been connected with it since the year 1835, and now contain 20,000 children. [Mr. MAGUIRE: 40,000.] 40,000! That makes the case stronger. There are then 40,000 children in daily attendance in those schools, and I think that it would be a very serious thing if we were to attempt to separate them from the National system. [Sir HUGH CAIRNS: I do not want to do it.] The hon. Gentleman says that he does not want to do it, but he says that the aid afforded to convent schools is at variance with the principles of the National system.

"The rules sanctioned by the Commissioners of National Education, so far as regards the operation of the aid afforded to convent or monastic schools, are at variance with the principles of the Board of National Education."

That I deny, and I believe that the House will agree with me. I hope that the House will not adopt either the Motion or the Amendment; because I am sure that this is an insidious attack upon the National system; and if you adopt this Resolution, and approve a censure upon a charge involving no sacrifice of principle, Parliament will be lending itself to an attack upon the Commissioners which will seriously affect a system which, so far from being, as the hon. Member for the King's County asserted, contrary to, is working in entire harmony with the wants, the wishes, and the feelings of the great bulk of the people of Ireland.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that he was sorry that an English Member interposing in an Irish debate should be thought out of place. ["No, no!"] He should not detain the House long, but he thought it right to reply at once to the speech of the right hon. Baronet, the conclusion of which was so entirely inconsistent with its commencement. The right

hon. Baronet had told the House that the convent schools were essentially denominational, and he ended by saying that they contained 40,000 children, and therefore fell within the purview of the National system and ought to be kept within it. There were other denominational schools which had more than 40,000 children in them. Was the right hon. Baronet prepared to admit them too? [Sir ROBERT PEEL: The convent schools were recognized so far back as 1835.] No one had in that debate found fault either with the convent schools or with the ladies who managed them so admirably. The point was, these ladies having entered upon a religious life, and being surrounded by emblems of denominational character, the children in these schools were as much brought up under a denominational system as if the schools were maintained specially as denominational schools. That had been recognized and condoned by Parliament, because it had gone on voting grants for education since the existence of these schools was brought to its knowledge in 1854. But the Commissioners were now introducing something which was entirely new, and which was giving rise to great dissatisfaction. Not only were the children to be educated in these convent schools, but teachers also, who were to go out and teach children in other schools; and the right hon. Baronet had admitted that the effect of that would be to destroy the district model schools, which were an essential feature of the system, and in which alone united education was carried out to any extent. The right hon. Gentleman said he wrote his letter before he knew what were the rules which the Commissioners proposed; and he received from the Commissioners a reply which was most insulting to him, which pooh-poohed him as a person who had no influence or power to affect anything which they did. They referred him, as a servant might be referred to his master, to the Lord Lieutenant, in terms which he should have thought might have kindled some little indignation in his mind. [Sir ROBERT PEEL: Will you read them?] He was speaking of the tone of the letter, but as the right hon. Baronet wished him to read the Correspondence he would do so. In the letter which the right hon. Baronet wrote before he knew what the rules were, he said—

"The attention of the Irish Government has been drawn to certain contemplated changes in the fundamental rules of the system of National Education in Ireland, the effects of which will be"—[not "I am told"]—"will be seriously to imperil the principle upon which the system is based."

That was what the right hon. Gentleman wrote to the Commissioners, and now he told the House that when he wrote it he did not know what the rules were. [Sir ROBERT PEEL: I entirely deny that assertion.] He did not wish to imitate irregularities, but he should like to ask the right hon. Baronet whether he had seen the rules when he wrote his letter?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he had not seen the written rules, but he had received verbal information from the Bishop of Derry, Dr. Henry, and other Commissioners as to the changes which were contemplated.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Four Commissioners told the right hon. Gentleman they had done so or were about to do so—[Sir HUGH CAIRNS: Had done, three months before]—and informed the right hon. Gentleman against what points these protests were levelled. The right hon. Gentleman thereupon wrote to the resident Commissioners, and from the Commissioners received a reply denying that a change in any fundamental principle of the system would be affected by the new rule, should it be carried into operation, or could have been contemplated by the Commissioners when they framed the proposed regulation. Until that evening it had always been supposed that the right hon. Gentleman objected, in the spirit of his letter, to the mode in which the rules had been dealt with; but now he found fault with the hon. Member for the King's County for having, as he said, blamed the Commissioners. Why, who began the blame? The right hon. Gentleman himself. Of the Commissioners some had protested against the acts of their colleagues; the Bishop of Derry—according to the right hon. Gentleman, one of the oldest friends of the system—declared that the fundamental rules had been altered. The right hon. Gentleman himself showed that the schools had been changed practically into denominational schools, and therefore it was idle to say that the system had not been departed from. It was the inevitable tendency of systems of education to fall into the hands of persons zealous as to religious matters. Except in the model schools they had always found great difficulty in carrying out the joint system. From the beginning there had been comparatively few schools under joint management. Rules had been made from time to time which were intended to check denominational education, but there had been a steady advance in that direction. After all the system of denominational education was that which had been the most successful. When they came to the question of educating the teachers they found themselves involved in something more material than the mere education of the children. As had been said by a great authority on this question of mixed education in Ireland—

"One of these religious persons in giving instruction will not only give it after secular education has been supplied, but will give it in conjunction with literary instruction."

It seemed to him a most remarkable thing that the Chief Secretary for Ireland should have sat down without intimating in any way the remedies which ought to be applied to cases that he admitted. Taking a great interest in the subject of education both in England and Ireland, he had read nearly all the Parliamentary papers issued on the subject, and thought it abundantly clear that the system originally established by Mr. Stanley had been departed from in many particulars. An atmosphere existed in the convent schools which must make them essentially places of religious instruction, and the same observation applied to Presbyterian schools. For the Presbyterian clergy in their evidence given before the Committee of 1854, admitted that when they gave religious instruction, although children might absent themselves if they thought proper, they would never desire them to leave, and everyone knew that, except acting under express direction, children in such matters were altogether helpless. The question for the House to determine was, whether the system of combined secular and separate religious education had been carried out as originally intended; had children of all denominations been brought together—in short, had the system succeeded or failed? The right hon. Gentleman held that it had succeeded, but seemed to stand nearly alone in that opinion. In fact, it was natural that persons, where they got a pretty good school, conducted according to their own principles, should prefer sending their children there than to a mixed school. In one small place, Castlecomer, he had heard of as many as eight schools being founded to accommodate the peculiar views of the parents, when one would have sufficed to do the work. In Ireland thirty scholars seemed to be considered sufficient to found a school, whereas in England small rural schools of less than one hundred were discouraged, it being one of the recommendations of the Committee of Council that small schools should as much as possible be combined with a view to getting better teaching. He had not spoken of any denomination with disrespect; his wish was that all should have fair play, and that education of the people should be made the paramount object, and not the advancement of any single denomination. But if it turned out that the working of the system was unsatisfactory, if nominally united it was practically a denominational system, then he thought that inquiry should take place, not, perhaps, by a Parliamentary Committee, but by an independent Commission. It might then be seen how much of the results complained of were attributable to the constitution of the Board, and whether twenty men living in different parts of Ireland, who could not be brought together with certainty at any one time, but some who might sit one day to reverse the decisions of their colleagues the day before, was not a system tending to throw too much power into the hands of a resident Commissioner. Of that gentleman he should speak with the highest possible respect; but he thought the charge devolving upon him was too great for a single mind, weighed down as he was in addition by the distracted counsels of a dissentient Board. The rule now introduced was essentially new, though it appeared from official documents that the payments it was intended to sanction had been made in past years without the sanction of any rule. Wherever a convent school was established, there, according to Mr. Sheridan's Reports, a secular school was put down; and under all the circumstances it appeared to him that inquiry must take place before the system could be put upon a basis satisfactory to Ireland, intelligible to that House, and worthy of the money voted by Parliament.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that as a Roman Catholic Member he might be supposed to know something of the class of schools that had been attacked by the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Hugh Cairns). He would do that hon. and learned Gentleman the justice to say that he dealt with every question in the spirit of a gentleman, with great calmness, courtesy, power of logic, and arrangement of his subject. But the hon. and learned Member for Belfast was in that instance the representative and organ of a body which had been the most bitter assailants of the National system, so long as that system was carried out on terms that were acceptable to the Roman Catholic people of Ireland. ["Oh!"] If he wanted to know the object of the Resolution he had only to listen to the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had been carried away by his excitement to use expressions that were not creditable either to his good sense or his political tact. He did not say it to the disparagement of the National Board, which had been of late very much improved, but he would assert that practically the mixed system in Ireland was a mockery and a sham, and the House must come to the same conclusion. To show that he did not indulge in mere claptrap, he would refer to the latest Report of the Commissioners. That Report, which came up to January 1, 1864, showed that the so-called mixed system never had, and had not now, any practical operation in Ireland. He was in favour of the existing machinery—of the central authority—of the assistance of the State in aid of local efforts—and of a system of inspection which would justify the State in giving that assistance; but he believed that the mixed system had practically failed. The opposition manifested between the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland and the divisions in the Board showed that the machine was not working well, and that if Parliament did not change the machinery it must change the essential spirit of the system. He would prove his point by a few figures. Leaving out Ulster, he would take the three provinces of Leinster, Munster, and Connaught. In the last quarter of 1863 there were, within a fraction, 400,000 children on the rolls of the National schools in those three provinces. In county Clare there were 20,043 on the rolls, but only 144 Protestants and 7 Presbyterians. The rest, 19,892, were Roman Catholics. In the county of Kerry there were 24,367 on the rolls, and only 337 Protestants and 5 Presbyterians. In Carlow there were 6,006 on the rolls, of whom 86 were Protestants, and only one a Presbyterian. In Kilkenny there were 15,984 on the rolls, and only 293 Protestants and 8 Presbyterians. The total number on the rolls in those three provinces was 397,000. In the entire province of Munster there were only 2,827 Protestants on the rolls, and 262 Presbyterians. In Leinster there were 4,448 Protestants and 576 Presbyterians. In Connaught there were 3,164 Protestants and 485 Presbyterians. The total number of Protestants on the rolls in those three provinces was 10,639; of Presbyterians 1,323. After that statement would any one tell him that the mixed system was not a sham. He believed the time was coming when the advocates of the denominational system in Ireland would triumph. That system existed in England, and no Minister of the Crown would change it. The scheme of Lord Stanley was conceived in the most admirable spirit, and for years faith was kept with the Catholics of Ireland. But why were the Catholic prelates and people alarmed? In consequence of the increasing attacks that were being made, some of them by insidious foes, others by open and aggressive enemies. The hon. Member for Roscommon had admitted that many of the safeguards of Lord Stanley's system had been broken down, to the injury of the Irish Catholics. He maintained that it was the duty of the Commissioners to do as they had done, and that it befitted the wisdom of the House to sustain them in what they had done. He had been astonished to hear the right hon. Gentleman the representative of the University charge the Commissioners with having lent themselves to further the machinations, ends, and objects of the monastic institutions. The right hon. Gentleman became animated by a most extraordinary frenzy when he spoke of nuns, monks, friars, and Jesuits. His hon. Friend (Mr. Hennessey) made a remarkable statement, on the best authority as he conceived. It appeared in a report of a meeting held in Dublin a few days ago, when the Rev. Mr. Kirby, one of the fathers, made a statement which had been answered and refuted by the Roman Catholic Dean of Cork. The story was that when the Inspector of the Board visited the Presentation Convent at Cork the children received instructions not to make the sign of the cross. When the hour struck, however, the instinct of the children was too strong to be repressed, and they made the sacred sign, the nun being in a state of trepidation, and afraid that the school would lose the grant. The answer of the Dean of Cork was, that there was but one Presentation Convent in Cork, of which he was the ecclesiastical superior, and he denied in the most explicit manner the statement that the Catholic children had at any time been directed not to make the sign of the cross, or that the nuns made use of any such words as had been attributed to them; nor did he believe that there were any nuns in Ireland capable of conduct which would have been a combination of meanness, deception, and dishonesty, and he regretted that Father Kirby should have been deceived by such a falsehood. Now, the attack which had been made on the convent schools—for everybody in Ireland believed that it was an attack—had been justified by quotations from the report of Mr. Sheridan. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) no doubt read the Mail, and, if so, he might have seen a letter from Mr. Sheridan explaining his report, and denying the inferences which were sought to be drawn from it. He had the letter of Mr. Sheridan in his hand, it was dated the 2nd of May, 1864, and in it Mr. Sheridan said, that so far from being dissatisfied with the extension of the convent schools he viewed it with the greatest satisfaction, and he hoped to live to see the day when such schools would be found among the mass of every Catholic population in Ireland, because he knew that it was only by means of those schools that the blessings of a sound literary and religious education could be given to those whom the National schools could never reach—namely, the homeless, outcast children who were sought out by the good men and women who conducted those schools. That was the deliberately recorded opinion of one of the head Inspectors of the Government, vindicating his Report from the interpretation sought to be put upon it by hon. Gentlemen. It was true that Mr. Sheridan had said that there was not sufficient teaching power in the convent schools. But that was in 1860, and since then there had been a great change, and the monitorial system, which had risen and expanded against the will of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, had given that teaching power, so that the fault found by Mr. Sheridan in 1860 no longer existed. There were convent schools in his own city which educated from 3,000 to 4,000 children, and which were admitted by the Protestants of Cork to be a blessing to the community, for this reason, that they gave a good literary as well as sound moral education. They taught cleanliness, industry, honesty; nor was the solicitude of the nuns confined to the school, but it followed the scholars into the world, watching over, directing, and advising them. At Kinsale there was a school of 800 girls, at the head of which was Mrs. Bridgman, who had followed Miss Nightingale to the Crimea, and with her band of sisters had been among the most successful of the nurses of our soldiers. That school had cost £2,200 in its erection; it was large, spacious, and commodious as any of the model schools which had been built at such vast expense to the State. In Middleton there was a school which contained 800 children, and which cost £1,300 or £1,400 in building. Some of the best teachers came out of those schools, and they were even the means of supporting families by the industry which they taught the pupils. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University had laid great stress on an unhappy phrase which had been used by Mr. Sheridan, who happened to say that the nuns were intolerant; but Mr. Sheridan's explanation was that he ought not to have used that word, because it was objectionable in itself and was liable to misinterpretation. He went on to say that he used the word intolerance, as was obvious in the context, simply to imply impatience of competition, and that he never meant it to signify religious intolerance, apologizing at the same time for employing a term capable of so offensive an interpretation. After that explanation, the charge of intolerance would, he hoped, never again be brought against the nuns of Ireland. It appeared, he might add, from what had been stated by the Commissioners, that so far from any favour having been extended to the convent schools, the very contrary was the fact. So far as pupil-teachers were concerned, any large and efficient school might have them as well as those which were attached to a convent, while the nuns, the Commissioners said, now received only one-third of the average sum paid to teachers of all classes. After an authoritative statement of that kind there ought, he thought, to be no alarm on the part of the Presbyterians of Ireland, whose memorial for an increase of the Regium Donum he had not long since signed on the principle of religious freedom. The Roman Catholics, he might add, asked for no assistance from the State for their Church or their clergy, and when men came from Ireland and sought for aid in the way in which the Presbyterians had done from Irish Roman Catholic Members, it was, he thought, scarcely right of them to urge two distinguished Members of that House to come forward to make an attack on institutions which were dear to the Roman Catholic people of that country. Seeing, he would further observe, the difficulties which existed in reference to the question of education in Ireland, the time must, in his opinion, come when the denominational system must be substituted for the mixed. The Archbishop of Canterbury was in favour of the denominational system, and Archbishop Cullen did not go one bit further in Ireland than the right rev. Prelate did in England. They were, he contended, both right, and Earl Russell was right in the view which he took on the subject. The Roman Catholic Church had made great efforts and sacrifices in the cause of education. All she asked was fair play and equal justice, and if that could not exist under a mixed system, it must be sought under that which solved all difficulties—the denominational system.

MR. BUTT said, he thought it unfortunate that they had been carried away into a general discussion of education in Ireland. He must confess that there never had been so much agitation raised about so small a change. In the month of November last the Commissioners republished their rules, and in one respect did they make a material alteration, which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Hugh Cairns) invited them to declare was at variance with the principles of National Education, and thus practically asked the House to pass a Vote of Censure on the Commissioners. Now, in 1831, immediately on the establishment of the system, the question arose whether the convent schools should receive aid; and it was found that the Kildare Place Society, which the system was intended to supersede, did give a large number of these schools assistance. The lending of support to them, therefore, was no new thing, nor could he understand how any person anxious to bring education and civilization to the lower classes in Ireland, could deliberately reject the services of those ladies who were so well calculated to effect those objects. The whole ground of the Vote of Censure which the House was asked to give was this, that the Commissioners had agreed to give in some schools of greater efficiency a little higher salary to first class monitors; and it was supposed that many of these would be convent schools. Had it been alleged that the convent schools had in any case injured the Presbyterian population? Yes; one solitary case had been raked up, but so far from establishing anything against the convent schools, it did quite the reverse. It appeared that at a school in Youghal two Protestant children remained there after the prescribed hours, and while certain prayers were pronounced. A great deal of correspondence took place, a special Inspector was sent down, and a Committee of the House of Lords was occupied in investigating the case. The consequence was, that the school at Youghal was separated from the National Board, and was afterwards supported by the people without National aid. That was the one solitary instance of anything like an approach to interference with the religion of Protestant pupils, and it showed that such a vigilance was exercised that any attempt to interfere with the religion of Protestant children in Catholic schools was almost impossible. It was objected that teachers would be educated in these, but that was not a departure from the principles of the National Board, for one of the first rules of the Board was, that patrons were to be at liberty to select their own teachers without government interference, if no special objection, arising from want of educational ability, were advanced. There was no reason why war should be made on these schools. The convent schools were not antagonistic to the educational system. If a denominational school meant the preponderance of any particular religious feeling, there was an end of the educational system; but the educational system did not contemplate that contingency. Peace and harmony would not be promoted by declaring that Catholic parents should send their children to schools presided over by a Presbyterian schoolmaster, or vice versa. With regard to the Question before the House, he trusted that in common honesty the Amendment would find no support. He believed the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast to be very mischievous, and that it would be understood in Ireland in a sense the hon. Member did not mean—as representing, not his own views, but the bigotry which had forced the proceeding upon him. With regard to the Amendment, he asked whether the hon. Member for the King's County joined in the attack on convent schools, and upon priests, friars, and Jesuits, for whom the House had been told the money of the State was voted. He believed that the hon. Member rather tried to get rid of that special attack, by involving the House in a general discussion, and converting the Resolution into an attack on the system of National education. But was that a fair way of dealing with the question? A distinct issue had been raised by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast—namely, whether the House should sanction a trifling concession to convent schools, and it was not fair to the House to attempt to evade that issue. He trusted that the Amendment would be rejected, and that a distinct decision would be come to on the issue raised by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, so that the people of Ireland might have the satisfaction of perceiving that the unworthy feeling of bigotry of those who had induced that hon. and learned Member to bring forward the Motion could not find many supporters in that House.

MR. LEFROY said, he regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman had introduced into the debate a tone which hitherto had been entirely strange to it. He did not think that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), in the able and powerful speech which he made on the question, ever intended to make the attack attributed to him by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken. The argument of the hon. Member for the King's County in support of his Amendment was, that the rules of the Board had been changed to meet the views of the Presbyterians, although their schools remained in connection with the Board. The foundation upon which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast rested his Motion was that the rules relating to convent schools had been a breaking in upon the original system of National Education. The concession to convent schools showed how much the original system had been changed. His objection was that the system was thus made denominational, and that the change tended to give convent schools the command of the education of the country. He (Mr. Lefroy) honestly avowed that he felt considerable difficulty in refusing to support the general Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for King's County, while he was prepared to support the particular Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast; but his hon. and learned Friend had supported his case by such plain and urgent reasoning, and facts, that on the whole he did not see why his support should be diverted from the Motion by a general Amendment. In giving his support to the Motion he stood in a different position from his hon. and learned Friend, who was a supporter of the National system. He himself never had been a supporter of that system, and in supporting the Motion he did so not so much from a desire to bring that system back to its original plan, as from a disinclination to see a denominational system established in Ireland. It was a hard thing for the clergy of the Established Church in Ireland that while, by changes in the rules, the Presbyterians and the Roman Catholics had been enabled to avail themselves of the benefit of the system, they were the only body who had been deprived of its advantages. However unjustly he might be attacked for avowing it, he believed the clergy of the Established Church had done themselves great credit by the consistency and firmness with which they had stood aloof from a system which did not allow them to teach the children the simple Word of God.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not think there is any one who has listened to the speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Lefroy) who will complain of its temper or tone, nor can any one charge him with disingenuousness in regard to the motives which govern his conduct in this matter; but I must confess I cannot understand the difficulty he feels in rejecting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for King's County for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast. It appears to me that the Motion and the Amendment are ostensibly in diametrical opposition to each other. In fact, the Amendment is hardly within the limits of Parliamentary Amendments; it is a complete inversion of the Motion, and it is such an extension of its scope as entirely to change the character of the debate. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast, assuming the language of the strictest sect of those who support the National Board, complains of an undue deviation from the original system; and the hon. and learned Member for King's County picks out of his Motion the very words on which its pith depends, and substitutes for it a Motion of a totally different character, assailing the very institution which the hon. and learned Member for Belfast professes to uphold. It is another question whether we may not find that there is a latent sympathy and concurrence in the object of the Motion and the Amendment; but on the surface they are like two valorous knights tilting against each other in mortal combat. I begin by declining to discuss the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman, whose abilities will always entitle him to the attention of the House, provided his Motion is made in the manner usually required by the rules of our proceedings. The question of the vital principle of the National system is of such vast importance to the internal condition, that if it is discussed it should be in a substantive Motion, and not by the introduction of an Amendment at a late period of a debate which seems to contemplate quite a different object. The system of National Education was devised in a spirit of political benevolence, and also of no small practical wisdom, and the very last object of its founders was either to wound religious feelings or to impair the efficiency of religious education. If we take the system in its principle, it is one of united literary and separate religious education; but we find from the first moment it was launched that it was, to a certain extent, out of harmony with the feelings of the country. It was thus far out of harmony with the feelings of the country that a series of adaptations were required to be introduced, beginning with the first establishment of the system, and coming down to the present time, none of which tended to subvert the essential principle of the scheme, but all of which have been departures from the abstract rigour of the theory. In the first place, the different Administrations of this country were most desirous to promote the principle of united education in Ireland. It appears, too, that in a large proportion of the schools there has been an admixture of pupils of different religious denominations; and I do not know, therefore, that we have any reason to suppose the effect of that admixture has been any other than what was contemplated by those who founded the system. The principle is one of united literary education; but, on the other hand, respect had to be paid to a fixed, and, with those who entertained it, a sacred feeling prevailing in Ireland, by separating, in regard to religious education, the creeds into which the people of that country are divided. My hon. and learned Friend fairly said that the mass of the clergy of the Established Church have not found it consistent with their religious feelings to avail themselves of the Government aid by accepting the National system. Well, whatever one may think of the abstract merits of the opinion held by those rev. gentlemen, no one can deny that the fact to which I have just referred bears evidence of their highmindedness. One may regret their decision, but all must admit that the fact of their willingness to suffer the loss of the contributions of the State is evidence of the highmindedness of the body. This is, however, certain, that the members of that body—I do not mean to say all, but the mass of them—represented in this discussion by my hon. and learned Friend, have put themselves in conflict with the principle of the National system by insisting on instruction from the Holy Scriptures being given in the schools, irrespectively of the desire of the children and their parents. Therefore, as far as regards those who are outside the limitations of the system, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast in bringing forward and supporting this Motion does not want to have that system made more strictly in keeping with the original intentions of the founders, because he has disapproved it—disapproves it and will continue to disapprove it as long as the system lasts. Heretofore the administration of the system has been characterized by successive modifications. But has there been any inequality in these modifications? If there has been a departure from the strict theory, has not that departure been in favour of all? Can it be said that exceptional favour has been shown to those conventual schools? I apprehend that cannot be said. I think it appears from the Returns that the amount of pecuniary support—which may be taken as the measure of the favour of the State—is less in the case of the convent schools, regard being had to the amount of work done by them than in that of other schools. It is true they enjoy an exemption, inasmuch as the teachers are not required to be examined or qualified in a model school; but in escaping from the ordinary regulations on that head they have lost a privilege much greater than that which they have accepted, because they lose the increased remuneration. Now, when we look at the Motion of the hon. and learned Member, what is it? He complains of a certain regulation of a certain date. And what is this regulation? Why, really those who do not look below the surface would find it difficult to understand why this regulation should be made the ground for an attack on the system.

What is there suspicious in permitting schools of a larger and more important class to have monitors of a more advanced age than those who are admitted in other schools? For nearly twenty years we have been engaged in developing and encouraging the monitorial system of education by means of subsidies from the State; and to retain the services of monitors who are not considered sufficiently advanced in age to become teachers, you have decided that in a more important class of schools monitors may be retained and trained for two years longer. Is there anything unjust and improper in that? It is found that convent schools obtain a considerable share of the advantage arising from that relaxation of the rule. And why is this the case? Because those schools are large, which testifies to the confidence which the people have in them; and because they are efficient, which is proved by the fact that they receive the benefit of this new arrangement. It is not because they are Roman Catholic; it is not because they are conventual, but because, on the grounds to which they have just referred, they become entitled to the favour of the State. If the hon. and learned Member for Belfast holds that the new rule deviates from rigid impartiality in favour of the conventual schools, that is no reason for attacking a plan which aims at giving perfection to the monitorial system. If any conventual school deviates from the rules of the Board, by all means visit it with corrective measures. It is stated that not long ago a conventual school at Carrick-on-Shannon was struck off the list because the use of the sign of the cross was practised during the hours of united education; but I think the scope and object of the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend are a great deal wider than its words. Why object to having three classes of monitors if you do not object to having two classes? Why is it right to train them up to eighteen years of age, when in the opinion of many persons they are not fit to take charge of schools, and wrong to train them up to the age of twenty, when they are fit to do so? The real scope and animus of the Motion seem to be to break up the original rule which let those convent schools in, for I find in a pamphlet put forward by the Ulster National Educational Association this statement—"Those conventual schools are institutions which, by their very nature, are of a sectarian character." Well, if by their nature they are of a sectarian character, why did the Earl of Derby admit them to receive aid from a non-sectarian system? They were admitted by him, for in 1836 the Commissioners, alluding to an attack made in a pamphlet, stated that they had been in communication with Lord Stanley, and that he thought it desirable that those schools should be brought under the National system. In my opinion the Earl of Derby would have committed a gross error if he had taken any other course. How was it possible to take any other course when those schools had received aid from the Kildare Place Society? How was it possible to take any other course when those schools had on their side the dearest religious feelings of the country? The Commissioners were right to grant them aid, though they could not expect men to be free from a strong religious and even ecclesiastical feeling. All that could be expected from them was, that they would conform to the rules of the Board; and it has been shown that any of them which do not conform to those rules and afford protection to the creed of the minority will not continue to receive the assistance of the State. Then see what was done after the admission of these schools. Are they the only ones which have got the benefit of the rule? I grant that the clergy of the Established Church have not extensively availed themselves of it, but the Presbyterian body have obtained the benefit of it. The Commissioners held that schools in connection with Presbyterian meeting-houses stood in the same position as those connected with communities of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and have, with impartial justice, granted to Presbyterians the privileges already given to Roman Catholics, on the ground that the special definite religious character of a school ought not to exclude it from the aid of the State, provided there is conformity with the rules of the Board. That is a broad, intelligible, rational principle, and having been announced, it ought to be acted upon fairly. It has been said that the effect of the regulation would be extremely injurious to the model schools, and that, in fact, the source and secret of it is hostility to these establishments. It seems to be held by some, that these model schools have a sort of exclusive claim to provide all the schools in Ireland with teachers. Now, from a very early period in the history of the system, when a distinction was introduced between vested and non-vested schools, it was resolved to allow very large scope to the discretion of local patrons and promoters. If that scope is to be allowed, if you expect the local patrons to give that vital aid to the schools which no mere money grant can supply, and to animate them with a spirit of religion and order, you must leave to them considerable latitude in the selection of masters, and must not confine them exclusively in their choice to those trained in institutions under the control of the Government. My desire would certainly be in dealing with such a question, as far as the difference of the circumstances permit, to apply the same principle of equity and consideration to the feelings of our fellow-subjects in Ireland as in England. Well, has the Government in England ever dreamt of monopolizing the supply of teachers for the primary schools? On the contrary, the first attempt of the Government in this country to establish an institution for the preparation of teachers was regarded with jealousy, and although it was conducted with judgment, although no charge was ever made against the training school at Knellerhall, yet it has been deemed a better and wiser course to allow the primary schools to depend upon voluntary agency, as far as the provision of teachers is concerned. Nay, more; the Government, while liberally furnishing the training colleges with funds, has left to the managers an almost absolute discretion as to the mode of administration. When such consideration has been shown in England to the feelings of the clergy, not merely of the Established Church, but of all religious denominations, is it wise or just, is it even decent, to go to Ireland and say, "Here is so much money for your schools, but we insist on your coming to the shop of the Government and no other, in order to obtain the commodity of a teacher?" I am very friendly to the principle of competition. I will not now discuss the question of the Government model schools in England; but I say that very considerable advantage would arise in Ireland from healthy competition between different nurseries and training grounds, under different auspices, for the preparation of teachers for primary schools. The Irish model schools, moreover, are not capable of turning out a sufficient number of teachers to meet the demand. ["Oh!"] Some men take their own opinions to be facts; but the fact is, I believe, as I have stated. At any rate, I will not contest the matter any further. But if that point be conceded, I do not scruple to say that it is not desirable to exclude that class of teachers who receive their education in schools which possess the undivided confidence of the great religious persuasions of the country. I see an hon. Friend opposite looking rather startled at that declaration; but, if the schools were all those of the Church of England, or of the Established Church in Ireland, would he be equally astonished? He would then, no doubt, take another view of the reasonability of giving free scope to the religious feelings of the managers of these institutions. It is only right and proper that the patrons of schools, as long as they adhere to the rules of the Board, should be at liberty to seek for teachers trained in establishments in which they themselves repose the fullest confidence. Allusions have been made to the approaching downfall of the National system, and a Board of three paid Commissioners has been proposed as a substitute for the present Board. I regard that proposition not as Chancellor of the Exchequer, considering the salaries involved, but on far higher and broader grounds; and I say that it inspires me with serious apprehensions. The existing Board is by its constitution and numbers something like a fair relative representation, and is, therefore, better calculated to maintain the system in the confidence of the people of Ireland than any scheme devised in a bureau for intrusting the distribution to three paid Commissioners. We know what the result would be—one would be claimed by the Presbyterians, another by the Established Church, and the third by the Roman Catholics. [SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I did not propose such a scheme.] I did not attribute any detailed scheme to the hon. and learned Gentleman. With a Board of three Commissioners there could not be nearly so fair a distribution of influence as with the existing Board. It seems to me that the very narrow scope of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Motion is a reason for supposing that he has some larger object in view. On what ground does he object to this third class of monitors? Why does he seek to disparage the rule of the Commissioners, and to deprive them of any discretion in this matter? In terms the Motion is narrow; in spirit it is broad. Whatever may be the motive with which it has been brought forward, its tendency would certainly not be very different from that of the proposal

of the hon. and learned Member for the King's County—to undermine and overturn a system which, upon the whole, has been accepted by the people of Ireland as a benefit and as a proof of confidence and kindly feeling on the part of this country, and which, if it continue to be administered as hitherto, in the same liberal spirit in which it was conceived, will not lend itself, under whatever pretext, to any considerations or proposals less broad and comprehensive than those upon which it was originally based.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Sir, I think the House has reason to congratulate itself both as to the substance and the tone of the greater part of the debate upon this subject. If I might take leave to refer to one particular speech, I would say, with the permission of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), that I never heard a question of this importance argued with greater fairness, ability, and point than by the hon. Gentleman, though I do not agree with his argument. If I might make an exception, I would say that I think the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt), in his speech, brought into the debate an asperity and an acrimony which I hope he did not intend to evoke, and from which, fortunately, up to that time, the debate had been free. Finally, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had obviously heard extremely little of the debate, and still more obviously had studied very little of the question, has made it necessary that I should set right some misrepresentations which he has—of course, unintentionally—made. It has been said that the form of the Motion which I have submitted to the House is really an attack upon convent schools, and a demand that convent schools shall be deprived of any aid from the Education Board. Now, I thought that in opening the discussion I had prevented any such apprehension. But I now repeat that not only would I not advocate any proposition for depriving convent schools, educating as they do some 40,000 or 50,000 children, of aid from a Board which calls itself National, but I would go further, and say that a Board of National Education would not be worthy of the name unless it applied itself to the question of how schools which educate such a body of children should be brought within its reach and supplied with aid by its means. I say now, as I have said in this House before, that in like manner the Board has to some extent deprived itself of the right to the name it bears, because, with regard to another large denomination in Ireland, educating a very large number of children, it has not in my judgment made all the exertions it might have made to bring them within the reach of its operations. Well, then, it was said I had expressed an opinion which must be considered a reprobation of convent schools as regards their mode of teaching and their general conduct. Sir, I expressed no opinion upon the merits of convent schools but one — namely, that, so far as I had heard, I believed the ladies presiding over those schools deserved every praise; that the industrial training of the children was excellent, and that the literary education was in many respects extremely good, though it was subject to some observations which I afterwards particularized. I say further, that it is impossible not to echo what has been said to-night in praise of the devotedness, the single-mindedness, the charity and benevolence of the ladies who conduct, and to a great extent support, these schools. All these matters are foreign to the question before the House—a question which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not fully apprehended. We do not desire to deprive convent schools of any Parliamentary aid, or to cast any reflection upon the conduct of them. I read the Report of Mr. Sheridan, the head Inspector of the Board, and I founded upon it a charge against the Board, because I say that if the Board had performed its duty properly, that Report would have been upon the table of the House, in order that we might see what Mr. Sheridan's opinions were, and might have controverted them if they appeared to be untrue, or acted upon them if they were well founded. I have not heard any justification for what the Board did in withholding the Report. And now that I am on the subject of the Board let me make another observation. With many members of the Board I have the pleasure of being acquainted; among them there are some valued friends of mine, and none more so than the resident Commissioner. But I must say that if the Board expect to command our confidence in this matter of reports they must not act upon their present system. With regard to Mr. Sheridan's Report, they concealed it from the House — I can use no other term. Perhaps they did not consider the matter as they ought to have done. Then, after this question had arisen at the Board between the Commissioners themselves as to the mode in which convent schools should be dealt with, and after the majority of the Board had announced their opinion upon the point, they next, as soon as Mr. Sheridan's Report finds its way to the light, call for new Reports from their various Inspectors. We have heard from the right hon. Secretary for Ireland that in a few days these Reports will be in the hands of Members. But this morning there came into the hands of hon. Members a circular or instructions to Inspectors as to the mode in which they are to make these Reports. I should like to call the attention of English Members to this point. A general form is given, twenty or thirty queries are put, and appended to them are four circular letters of instruction, issued in hot haste, one after the other, within a week. The first says—

"The Commissioners of National Education have directed us to call upon you to make a special inspection of and report on each convent or monastic school in your district. We are, therefore, to instruct you to suspend at once the discharge of every other duty, no matter what its character, in order to carry out the wishes of the Board on this important business. We have, accordingly, to request that you will spend a day or so in the study of the queries and headings contained in the special form, on which you are to make your report on each school, and we cannot possibly doubt that, after an inspection based upon an intelligent apprehension of these queries, you will be able to give such an honest, thoroughly impartial, and comprehensive report of each convent or monastic school in your charge as will assist in the elucidation of truth in respect to a controversy which you can scarcely have failed to observe is going on in reference to convent schools."

That is, a controversy one party to which were the Commissioners themselves. They had pronounced in the most solemn way their positive and distinct opinion upon every one of those points on which they were asking for a Report; and, I ask, is it right after that to send out a circular telling the Inspectors that the object of the information they are to supply is to prove which of two parties is right in a particular controversy, the Board themselves being one of the parties? Two days' reflection leads the Board to think that a little more instruction was necessary, and what do they tell the Inspectors?—

"That suggestions, technical details, &c., appropriate in ordinary reports, are accordingly to be avoided. Should the consideration of this Report suggest any points of an important nature for the improvement of these schools as to organization, &c., such points can be made the subject of a special communication to the Board at some future period."

So the Inspectors are told—"Go and examine the schools; answer the queries put to you; if, however, you see anything in the schools which requires improvement, do not tell us of it in this Report, which is to go before Parliament in order to settle the controversy, but supply the Board with private information on the subject at some future periods." Now, I see opposite to me one of the Commissioners, and I ask, was he a party to the settling of those instructions, or, if not, does he approve them? I feel satisfied as to what his answer must be. Far be it from me to suggest that there is any ground for an attack upon the convent schools as regards their mode of teaching; but I do say, if anything could lead the public to believe that there was such a ground, it is the issue of such a circular, with such special directions. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says, the true explanation is that from the very beginning the rigid theory of the system had to be adopted from time to time in order to make it suit the various strong religious feelings and sentiments which were found in the country; and the first instance of this, he says, is when the Earl of Derby, as Chief Secretary for Ireland, approved the introduction into the system of convent schools, they being sectarian schools; and he adds that my Motion is a covert disapproval of that step. Now, I have had the honour of a seat in this House for a number of years, and although during that time we have had many discussions on National Education in Ireland, I do not remember that we were ever before favoured with one sentence from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I spoke on it before you came into the House.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Well, for ten or twelve years, although there have been many debates, I have never heard him open his mouth before upon this subject. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has no right to say, I having on scores of occasions expressed my opinion in favour of the Board generally, that under cover of this Motion I am seeking to undermine it; but let us see whether the Board has always shown itself so very anxious to conciliate persons of religious feelings in Ireland by softening the rigid theory of the system as it originally stood. I could mention several cases, but let me take the most recent one. In 1860 the clergy of the diocese of Derry, who were desirous of putting their schools under the Board, said they were willing to allow any child whose parents objected to leave the school-room during religious instruction, but they did not like to appear as if they were driving children away when religious instruction was about to be given. They accordingly asked to be allowed to make a slight alteration in the notice to be put up, so that they might not appear to be urging children of other denominations to go away, but rather to be encouraging them to stay. A proposal to that effect was made to the Board, but that body, so anxious to soften the rigid asperity of the original system, flatly and even rudely refused the request preferred to them, and in a curt answer declined to sanction any alteration whatever. Again, the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that a large alteration has been made in the rules, to meet the views of the Presbyterians; but the truth is there never was any printed or published rule altered on behalf of that body. I admit that a degree of facility was given to schools taught and conducted as the Presbyterian schools were which led to their placing their schools under the Board; but nothing whatever was done with respect to the Presbyterians or their schools which was not freely offered at that time and since to all denominations in Ireland. The modification in question was not made exclusively on behalf of the Presbyterian body, but embraced all schools under the guardianship of the Commissioners—a fact which marks the difference between the case of the Presbyterians and such a case as the Motion before us would deal with. But to come to the precise point of my Resolution, the Chancellor of the Exchequer asks what objection we can possibly have to a third class of monitors, there being two classes in existence already. The right hon. Gentleman is evidently not aware that, so far as the printed and published rules went, up to November, 1863, it was not lawful for convent schools to have any kind of monitors, either senior or junior, not to speak of that class now invented for the first time, and to be called first-class monitors or pupil-teachers. In the original letter of Mr. Stanley, it was laid down as one of the essential principles of the Board, that the teachers should be trained in a model school under the sanction of the Commissioners. Every one knows that the model schools are at this moment, and have been for some time, the objects of special enmity and attack by a certain body of great numbers and influence, whose aim is to have teachers who shall be trained, not in the model schools, but in schools under the direction and exclusive government of themselves. The Board has established rules by which, under the name of monitors, teachers can be trained in those exclusive schools, and the consequence must be that the teachers so trained will be selected for all the schools of the same denomination throughout Ireland. It seems the Chancellor of the Exchequer likes a healthy competition, and he wants to see such a rivalry between the teachers trained in the model schools and those trained in the convent schools; but the fact is the competition will be confined to the Government themselves. They have built model schools for the purpose mainly of training teachers, and upon those schools they spend a very large sum yearly, and now we see them encouraging a system which is to withdraw all the children from the model schools in the first place, and, in the next, to put an end to all the demand for teachers from institutions founded and maintained at such great expense, because, of course, the teachers trained in the exclusive convent schools will be chosen by the Roman Catholic body for their general schools throughout the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer talks of my hostility to the Board, and yet in the same breath he rings the knell of the model schools, which, I venture to say, cannot survive the system inaugurated and approved by the Government for the space of two years. One word with respect to the speech of the Chief Secretary and I have done. I was under a delusion during almost the whole of that speech. I thought the right hon. Baronet was supporting my Motion with great vigour and effect. He said it was a mistake to suppose that my Motion was intended to cut off the convent schools from the Board, or was meant to cast any imputation upon the teaching of the convent schools. No person could deny, he added, that the convent schools were in direct competition with the model schools, which he thought must be seriously damaged; and he said, moreover, that it was necessary the convent schools should be checked. He also told us that the teachers should not be trained by those who, like the ladies in convent schools, were not able to train them upon fixed and scientific principles; but he concluded by assuring the House that the Attorney General for Ireland and himself were quite "synonymous"—I think that was the word he used—quite synonymous in their views. Not only does the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary hold these opinions, but they are those also of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General, for their opinions are "synonymous." I fully expected, after hearing those opinions, that the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to support my Resolution; but, on the contrary, he has told us that he intends to vote against it, and that he believes such a course to be perfectly inconsistent with his letter of the 30th of January, 1864. Now, what was the opinion that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary then held, and which he holds still? He said that when he wrote the letter he had not seen the rules of November, 1863. He said, however, that he had received remonstrances from the Presbytery of Derry and the Presbytery of Belfast. Both those bodies had seen the rules, and not only adverted to them, but stated their opinion and argued upon them. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary mean to say that at the time he wrote the clear and definite letter of the 30th of January he had no distinct knowledge of the nature of the rules?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I had not seen the rules myself; but, as I have already stated, I had been told by four Commissioners what they were.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: The House will, no doubt, be glad to hear if the business of the Government is always conducted in the same manner at Dublin. Would the right hon. Baronet be content, on the strength of a simple assurance, and without examination, to write, "The attention of the Irish Government has been drawn to certain contemplated changes in the fundamental rules of the system of National Education in Ireland, the effects of which will be seriously to imperil the principle upon which the system is based?" But the matter does not rest upon that. He had those two remonstrances in addition to what he might have been told by the four Commissioners, and it is impossible to avoid seeing that the Chief Secretary believed them to be, as he affirmed, "fundamental rules of the system of National Education in Ireland." The right hon. Baronet said that the convent schools were in direct competition with the model schools, and that they ought therefore to be checked.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: What I did say was, and I gave it as my opinion only, that the convent schools had increased so much of late years that they would soon destroy the model schools altogether, and that they ought therefore to be checked.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: The right hon. Baronet has repeated in stronger terms still the very expression which I endeavoured to put down in writing. He says that it is his opinion, but it is something more. It is the opinion of the Attorney General, for they are "synonymous." And then the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that in England you have separate training for teachers—why not, therefore, adopt the same practice for Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman's theory appears to be that the system is to be defended in one country because it exists in another.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said no such thing. I said that, so far as circumstances would admit, the same principles would be applied to the two countries.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: It is the Chancellor of the Exchequer who has pronounced the doom, if that doom has been pronounced, of the Irish system of National Education. To him and the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General belong the honour, if honour it may be, of destroying a system which, if carried out in the spirit in which it was originally designed, without the alterations introduced since, has bestowed, and is still bestowing, inestimable benefits upon the people of Ireland.

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, he could not but complain of the unfounded insinuation which the hon. Member for Belfast had urged against the Commissioners—that they had perverted the truth. The extract from the instructions to the Inspectors, which had been quoted by the hon. Member, ought not to be read alone, but ought to be accompanied by the two previous clauses. The Commissioners desired to receive every information and suggestion about the schools which could possibly be of any advantage; but as those statements were too long and wearisome for the public generally, another form had to be filled up, confining the Report to the bare statement of facts. He would only say further, in reference to some humorous observations which were made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, that many things might be said in the course of debate by one Member, which another Member could not approve; but, as far as his own opinions were concerned, they had been stated perhaps at too great length, and possibly with too great elaboration, on a former occasion, but he was quite willing to stand by his own opinions and by nothing else.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked why the clergy of the Church of Ireland did not avail themselves of the advantages offered by the Board, and he declared that a man of his great understanding could not comprehend why they did not. He would tell him why. Because they belonged to the Church of England, which the right hon. Gentleman was supposed to represent, and he referred him to a petition signed by 5,000 of the clergy of the Church of England to that House, in which they said they approved that decision. They were the founders of the Kildare Place Society, and he spoke truly when he said that that society did give aid to convent schools, but they did so upon the condition that, in the schools receiving aid, the Scriptures should be read. He thought Lord Stanley was right in directing that aid should be given to those convent schools, and he also thought the convent school of Youghal should receive aid, but not under false pretences. The point for the House to consider was, whether there was any solution but one—to let the religious element free, and to provide a good secular education available for all classes. He knew no other solution but that. The hon. and learned Member for Youghal had declared that the Motion proceeded from bigotry of gentlemen in the North of Ireland. Was the House aware that the promoters were strong supporters of the Government, that Mr. Gibson, who was returned for Belfast by the Catholics and Presbyterians, had signed the protest? If the Attorney General for Ireland had read the names of the eminent merchants of Belfast who were strong supporters of Roman Catholic emancipation, he would find those names amongst those who were now protesting against these changes; and it was, therefore, unwise of the hon. and learned Member for Youghal to attack some of the most acute and intelligent men to be found in all Ireland.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would not press his Amendment if the hon. and learned Gentleman would withdraw his Resolution.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Government would vote against the Amendment, and then the division would be taken upon the original Resolution.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BERNERS said, he desired to call attention to two passages in the letter of Mr. Sydney Turner, read to the House on the previous evening by the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council; the one being, "I had a full private conference with the superintendent of the Ashby division of police," and the other, "I should be glad if the inaccuracy of the charge made by Lord Berners against my inquiry could be brought out." [The noble Lord proceeded to read several letters on which he had grounded the charges he had made against the management of the institute.]

Sir George Grey

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

EARL STANHOPE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the present position of the Royal Academy, and to ask what further steps respecting it are in contemplation by Her Majesty's Government, said, that it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that a Royal Commission had recently inquired into the state of the Royal Academy. That Commission had presented an unanimous Report, and a large blue-book of evidence. Since then there had been an answer from the Royal Academy, a proposal by the Government, and a decision, on one point, by the House of Commons. Under these circumstances, their Lordships would probably not think it out of place in him, having been the Chairman of that Commission, to address some inquiries to the Government on the matter, and to invite a discussion in their Lordships' House. There were two principal questions involved in the case of the Royal Academy; the first, the provision for better accommodation and more adequate space; and the next, the new rules by which the Academy was to be governed. At first sight these two questions might seem to be entirely separate from each other; but, in fact, they would be found to some extent connected. It would be found, too, that many of the defects of management imputed to the Royal Academy resolved themselves into a want of space. For example, complaints were justly made that the schools were closed to the pupils when they were most wanted—namely, in the spring and summer; but the reason of that great defect was merely this, that the apartments in which the teaching took place were then required for the exhibition of pictures, and there remained only a small chamber in the roof, where some few of the pupils still pursued their studies. Again, many artists complained of the manner in which their pictures were hung, in gloomy nooks, or almost on the top of the walls, where they could be but indistinctly seen. The position of these pictures reminded him of the saying of an artist described in a German play, who is boasting of the great skill with which he had represented the miraculous darkness of the land of Egypt. "So well have I pourtrayed it," said he, "that I defy any one of you to discover hand or foot in any part of my painting." This was very much the case with many of the pictures exhibited at the Royal Academy. Similar to this was the position of the sculpture, which, until lately, was consigned to a kind of cellar—for by no other name could he call it—where none of its merits could be discerned. All this was solely attributable to want of space. The Commission had examined Mr. Frith, who was at that time the head of the "hanging Committee"—an ominous name—and who told them that they were conscious of often doing great injustice to artists, but it was beyond their power to avoid it—many excellent pictures were inevitably hung in unfavourable positions. Besides, there were many excellent works which could not be exhibited at all. These were faults for which the Royal Academy were not responsible. It was the fault of want of space. The Commission had consequently found it impossible to disjoin the consideration of this question from the question of the National Gallery. There, also, was not space enough to accommodate the yearly accession of pictures, partly arising from purchase, and partly from bequests; and the Commission had therefore to consider the two questions together. In their Report the Commissioners state two plans by which this deficiency might be remedied. The first was that the National Gallery should be removed to a building to be erected in connection with Burlington House, and that the whole of the building in Trafalgar Square should be handed over to the Royal Academy. The other plan was that the Academy should receive from the Crown a site at Burlington House, on which to erect a building for themselves. Both these schemes were explained in the Report, but the Commissioners expressed no opinion as to the relative merits of either. It has subsequently seemed, however, that the Government preferred the former. They had proposed the plan of a new National Gallery, at a cost of £150,000, and the space at Trafalgar Square to be appropriated to the Royal Academy. Mr. Cowper, as First Commissioner of Works, brought forward an estimate, and asked for a Vote on account to carry out that object; but the opinion of the House of Commons was adverse to the proposition, and it was defeated by a majority of 174 to 122. He should refrain from saying a single word on the merits of that decision, for he held it to be a good rule in their Lordships' House, that what they could not interfere with they ought not to comment on. The House of Commons exercised its own discretion, and he did not deny that there were very strong reasons for the conclusion to which it came. But that decision being taken, the question now was, what plan ought to be adopted, and it was on this point he asked information from Her Majesty's Government. There was still open to them the second scheme which he had mentioned. It was the same which had been come to under the Government of his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Derby), under which the Academy undertook to construct at their own charge a new edifice in Burlington Gardens. It was much to be regretted that that arrangement, which was on the very point of its completion when Lord Derby retired from office, had not been confirmed by the present Government. The site, which was one of those which had been selected by the Commission, was of the value of £60,000, and by the grant of so valuable a property the Crown would have retained a very important power—the power to give weight and influence to its opinions as to the right management of the Academy.

He now came to the second question—the recommendations of the Commissioners in regard to the management of the Academy. The Royal Academy as a body was nominally composed of forty Academicians. There were two additional Academicians who filled rather an anomalous position, the nature of which he had never been able to understand. The only certain thing about it was, that it was not greatly relished by themselves. Practically, however, and apart from names, there were forty-two members. The Commissioners proposed that the number should be increased to fifty; and to that recommendation the Academy had declared they were willing to accede. But the Commissioners further proposed that to the fifty artists there should be added ten laymen, and they had not determined to make that recommendation without some important testimony having been given in its favour. Of all the witnesses examined who were not themselves artists, there was no person whose evidence the Commissioners valued more, or on which they laid greater stress, than that of his noble Friend whom he saw opposite (Lord Taunton), and what did he say?—

"I think very highly of the liberality of sentiment of the Royal Academicians generally speaking, and the manner in which they have discharged their duties; at the same time, in every institution of the kind, there is a certain narrowness which is always apt to produce an influence; and I think, as one might have expected, there are some points on which it may be said that some such feeling is not unjustly suspected by the public. Therefore, I think the infusion of the lay element would have a tendency in conciliating the confidence of the general public, and it might have some practical effect in improving the working of the system."—p. 421.

So far Lord Taunton. That was also the view of the Commission. Then, as among artists, Baron Marochetti warmly approved the lay element. He said, from his knowledge of foreign academies, that in those the lay members "were always considered as more liberal than the others;" and being asked by Lord Hardinge—

"Would you willingly yourself accept a judgment upon your works of sculpture from a person who was not a sculptor and had not studied?"

He answered—

"With the greatest pleasure; it always comes to that."

Mr. Watts, in like manner, said—

"I have heard it suggested that there should be certain lay members in the Academy, and I think that this would be very advantageous, as representing the opinion from without."

Then Mr. Watts was asked—

"Do you not think that it might be distasteful to the artists themselves?"

He answered—

"I do not see why it should be; I do not think that any artist paints his pictures for his brother artists only; they are to be judged of by men of intellect."

It was quite true—and he did not wish for a moment to conceal it—that several artists of great weight expressed an opposite opinion. But besides the direct advantage of lay members in the government of the Academy, the Commissioners thought that some gentlemen of taste and talent, not being themselves artists, would, in conjunction with the professional members, be of great value as a council of reference in matters of art. It had been a common complaint, and certainly not in all cases an unfounded one, that there was an utter want of taste in the designs from which many of the public buildings of London had, for many years past, been constructed; and it had also been remarked that, owing to the changes of the executive Government, there were fluctuations in respect of such designs which led to very unfavourable results in respect to public works. If there was a council of reference such as that to which he had just referred, its opinion must prevail with the First Commissioner, and a gentleman filling Mr. Cowper's official position would feel himself supported by the opinion of the Council of the Academy. At present, if Mr. Cowper stated an opinion, any other Member of Parliament was free to spring up and give his own opinion as in his view equivalent to Mr. Cowper's. That would not be the case, however, if Mr. Cowper were able on such occasions to speak in the name of the Academy, and not solely in his own. But the Academy looked with apprehension on the admission of laymen. The Academicians, he was afraid, thought that the lay members would be exactly like the connoisseurs described in the days of Goldsmith, and when, as Goldsmith said, only two things were essential to the character—the first thing was always to say—what certainly no man could contradict—that the picture then under judgment would have been still better if the artist had taken more pains, and the second was on all occasions to praise the works of Pietro Perugino. The Commissioners proposed that the lay members should be elected for only five years, with eligibility for re-election, and that the choice should be left—to whom? To the Crown? To Parliament? To any extraneous body? No; the proposal was that the choice of such lay members to sit in the Royal Academy should be left to the Royal Academy itself. His own opinion was, that it would be difficult to imagine a more innocuous or less aggressive proposal. The Academicians said—

"The artist element was wanting in the Commission, and we confess we do not see how it could have been easily supplied; yet we cannot refrain from remarking that the Commissioners who have come to the conclusion, justly or not, that a very moderate addition of the lay element might assist the judgment of artists, seem to have overlooked the tendency of their argument in an opposite sense, having apparently felt no want of professional judgment in their private and final decisions. Their views are, after all, those of unprofessional men."

Now, the Commissioners certainly thought they had obtained these artistic opinions to the fullest extent by the large number of distinguished artists whom they examined. But how strangely inconsistent was that mode of reasoning on the part of the Academy! The Academy blamed the Commission as consisting solely of laymen without any admixture of the artistic element, and yet they were thoroughly satisfied with their own position as consisting solely of artists without any admixture of laymen. Their argument, then, when it came to be examined, was directly in the teeth of their own conclusion. Under all the circumstances the question was one with which the Government would have to deal, and with them the final decision must rest. With regard to the Associates, they were at present twenty in number, and had no share in the government of the Academy. The Commissioners proposed to increase the number from twenty to fifty, and to give them a share in the management. The Academy was willing that there should be an increase in the numbers, but they did not state what number they were willing to approve. The Commissioners also recommended that the Academicians should each be entitled to send four pictures for exhibition, and they had further suggested that the Associates should not, as of right, send any. Upon this point the greatest interest was felt by artists; a memorial had been recently sent to him signed by several distinguished names; and having consulted his colleagues, with the exception of Mr. Stirling, who was unfortunately absent from town on account of illness, they, the late Commissioners, had re-considered their former opinion on this particular point. He was enabled to say that they now concurred with him in thinking that if the Academicians were entitled to send four pictures, the right to send two should be extended to the Associates. There remained a very important point—namely, whether the Associates should or should not have any vote in the government of the Academy and in the election of Academicians. That they should have votes was a point which was pressed in the Report of the Commissioners, and he looked upon this as a point of vital importance. On the other hand, the Academicians proposed that the Associates should have no votes, but that they should exercise a certain right of nomination. What was proposed in the paper of "Observations" by the Academy was this—that in case of any vacancy in their ranks every

Associate should have the power to nominate a candidate; but that the entire right of election, without the smallest necessary reference to such nominations, should be vested in the Academicians only; and the Academicians went on to make this very extraordinary observation—

"The right of nomination which we propose, as distinguished from personal voting in elections, is an important privilege as such, but its great utility would be to put the Academicians in possession of opinions which might sometimes differ from their own."

Was there ever a more extraordinary statement than that it should be considered a great privilege in persons not having votes to nominate a candidate, without the least right of electing him? Suppose the same principle were extended to Parliamentary reform, and it was proposed that the right of voting should be left with the £10 householders, but that those below them should be allowed to nominate a candidate, there not being the least obligation on the part of the £10 householders to elect this person! To the plan of the Academicians the artists, he believed, entertained the strongest possible objection, and thought they ought to have the votes which the Commissioners said should be given to them. If the Academicians had been determined still to regard the Association as inferiors, and to treat them as dependents, it would have been far better to reject the proposal of the Commissioners altogether. He should be glad to learn from the noble Earl (Earl Granville) some declaration of the opinion of the Government on these points; but whatever was his opinion respecting them, no site should be given for the Royal Academy, and no new building provided, until there was some understanding as to the reformation of the rules; and Parliament, he thought, had a right to require that no new rules should be finally ratified until they had been laid on the table of both Houses. On this point he hoped to obtain a special assurance. He had not made these remarks as an enemy of the Academy; on the contrary, he had always endeavoured to show himself one of its supporters. He thought that he showed himself its supporter now in urging these improvements, which he looked upon as most desirable for its own well-being. As to the advantage of an Academy, as such, he had no doubt at all. He did not know whether there were any in the House, but he knew there were some out of doors, who had formed a very prejudiced opinion upon the subject. Many appeared to think that the Academy was being supported solely for the sake of the Academicians, and Art for the sake of the artists. He maintained that such was not the case. They desired to support the Academy because, as an order of merit among artists, as combining in harmonious action the divers branches of painting and sculpture, of architecture and engraving, and as a great school of art, both by its example and its teaching, it was capable of rendering most important services. They supported art not for the sake of artists, but for the sake of the whole people, because the extension of art always tended to elevate and refine the people among whom its influences were at work. He would ask their Lordships to look at the increased feeling for art which had been displayed in this country during the last thirty or forty years. Of the progress of that feeling during the last period, he could give one proof, which might be deemed trifling by many, but which, to his mind, was most significant. He referred to the different result of admission to show-places thirty or forty years ago and at the present time. It was forty years ago the common complaint of gentlemen who admitted the public to their gardens that all their best flowers were plucked, or their young shrubs pulled to pieces. If a gentleman admitted the public to view his galleries or saloons, he would find his panels soiled, or, what was still worse, scrawled over with a host of insignificant names. But was that the case now? Many of their Lordships were in the habit of opening their pleasure grounds to the public for one or two afternoons in every week, and he appealed to them whether it was not true that it seldom or never happened that they had any damage to complain of. Then, as to the behaviour of the people in the public buildings, there could be no stronger case than that of the National Portrait Gallery. Last year they admitted large crowds during the Easter week, while from the confined space there could be nothing like any efficient supervision. Yet the Secretary said, in his report to him, "Many young lads and factory boys were among the visitors, and I am happy to add that from first to last every one was quiet and well-behaved." He maintained, then, that in England the feeling for art was extending more and more. He believed that the question of art and of the Academy as an appointed means for promoting art might at any time without presumption be brought before their Lordships. It was a question which on all occasions might claim their sympathy, and which they might be certain would reward their care. He would now ask his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council, what further steps respecting the National Gallery are in contemplation by her Majesty's Government?

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that he had read some time since the very able Report of the Royal Commission, and he had also seen the answer of the Royal Academy, and he was bound to say that, able as the Report was, the answer was also an able paper, and remarkable for the good taste and feeling which pervaded it. He believed, however, that his noble Friend (Earl Stanhope) was mistaken in the conclusions which he had drawn from the observations contained in the answer in reference to the introduction of the lay element into their government. He believed that the answer was urged more as a tu quoque argument. The Academicians argued that if the Commissioners, who were all laymen, without a single artist among their number, were competent to decide questions involving the interest of art, the Academicians, who were all artists, might not unreasonably be allowed to exercise their judgment without the interference of laymen. The introduction of the lay element would, he believed, give rise to great dissension. Undoubtedly, all art, and, therefore, all artists, must bend to the influence of public opinion, and therefore laymen would eventually decide upon the merits of the highest artists; but, at the same time, it was better that that influence should be felt from without than that it should obtain admittance within the walls of the Academy. He would remind his noble Friend that the Royal Academy had deservedly earned the confidence of the public, for it was an institution to which the country was greatly indebted. He was afraid, however, that his noble Friend had taken the Academy by surprise by the course he had taken in bringing forward the present Motion. The question between the Associates and the Academy was one requiring great consideration, and one upon which it was impossible for the House to give an opinion. The site was also a most important matter. After the decision of the House of Commons he believed they must consider the retention of the National Gallery in its present position as a settled point. Nobody would dispute that the Royal Academy must have a proper site, and it was no less certain that it could not remain in its present situation. Nothing would be left for the Royal Academy but to go to Burlington House, and a gallery fit for the reception of the national pictures could then be formed at Trafalgar Square. The Royal Academy had accumulated from the profits of their annual exhibitions a sum of £80,000, which they were prepared to expend as might best suit the Government, either at Burlington Gardens or at Trafalgar Square. He trusted the Government would consider well before it sought to impose terms upon the Royal Academy which that body was not inclined to accept. The Royal Academy was entitled to expect, and he had no doubt it would receive, liberal treatment from the Government, such as was worthy of a body representing the artists of the country.

EARL STANHOPE explained that he had not taken the Royal Academy by surprise, as a week ago he had given private notice to the President of his intention to make a statement upon the subject.

LORD TAUNTON said, that no doubt the great question for consideration was the selecting a proper site and providing a suitable building for the national collection. He cared little whether that were done by transferring the old Gallery to Burlington House, or by retaining the old Gallery upon its present site, to transfer the Royal Academy to Burlington House. For himself he would prefer the first arrangement; but the House of Commons had not thought fit to sanction that arrangement. At present, all the operations of the Royal Academy were crippled, and undeserved blame was cast upon them, because the question of future site was left in uncertainty. It really was lamentable to find that many Members of the House of Commons were disposed to quarrel with every proposition that was made upon this subject. There appeared to be in that House great antipathies, and it seemed incapable of agreeing to any consistent plan. At present, the operations of the Academy were greatly crippled, and they were blamed because they did not make sufficient provision for the instruction of pupils and other objects; but he believed that the blame was undeserved, and that it was not in their power to do so. In his opinion, the only boon that Government could grant them was a site on which they could conduct their operations. He confessed that he was jealous of any interference on the part of the Government with the detailed management of artistic institutions; and he had no desire to see the Royal Academy made a branch of the public service, or submitted to the control of any Minister of the Crown, or the superintendence of any dilettanti connoisseurs whatever. Art, like every other form of our national life, ought to rest mainly on a feeling of independence. That was the feeling which would be most congenial to English artists, because they were educated English gentlemen. He certainly valued highly, and he believed the members of the Academy valued highly, the connection between them and the Crown which had existed since its foundation by George III. It was graceful to the Crown, and it afforded a most useful stimulus and encouragement to artists. But he did not think it was desirable that any more direct connection should exist between them and the State. He would strongly deprecate any Ministerial interference in the matter, and he hoped that his noble Friend the President of the Council would not give his sanction to any system of enforcing a series of minute regulations upon the Royal Academy. The Commission over which his noble Friend had presided so ably had made some very valuable suggestions, and those suggestions had been received in a fair spirit by the Royal Academy. For his own part, he thought that an infusion of the lay element into the governing body would be useful, as tending to counteract that narrow spirit into which all men, of whatever profession, if left entirely to themselves, were apt to fall, and it would also give confidence to the public. If, however, he found on the part of artists or of the Academicians a very strong repugnance to the introduction of the lay element, he would rather forego the probable advantages than force upon them an unwelcome change. The Royal Academy had now existed for nearly 100 years, and no one could deny that during that time the names of very few of our greatest artists had been omitted from its roll, showing that upon the whole their selections had not been unsatisfactory. He trusted that while the Government suggested to the Academy such improvements as they might think desirable, they would deal with them in a large and liberal spirit, and that they would not attempt to force upon them any conditions which would interfere with their independence. But if the Royal Academy was to be subject to some kind of Government authority, and if its affairs were to be continually interfered with by Parliament, because it happened to receive indirectly some contribution of public money, he thought the Academy would act wisely, and for the interest of the art which it represented, if it were to decline to receive such public assistance, and to fall back upon its own resources, retaining only that personal connection with the Crown which he trusted would never be terminated.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he shared in the regret which had been expressed at the temper in which this subject was usually discussed in the other House. It was quite unintelligible to him why the Royal Academy, which he believed had done its duty to the country for the hundred years of its existence, should be regarded by that assembly with a feeling which seemed almost to amount to dislike. The country in his opinion owed a deep debt to the Academy, and never was censure less deserved than the censures which had been passed upon it. He had seen with great satisfaction the temper with which the Royal Commission had been conducted, and he believed any difference of opinion that might exist with respect to the Royal Academy was very slight indeed. From the tone of this debate it was evident what they all wished was that the Royal Academy should exist in dignity and independence. He agreed with his noble Friend who had just sat down, that it would be most inconvenient and unwise if the Government should approach the Royal Academy in any tone of patronage, and he did not expect that they had any inclination to do so. The Academy felt no doubt that they were in a position of great independence, in which they could, if they chose, separate themselves from the Government, and even have no exhibition at all. This was not, therefore, a moment when hard conditions should be imposed on them. On the question of the introduction of the lay element into the governing body, he owned he thought the Royal Academy had been strangely forgetful of their own origin and history. The Royal Academy sprang from a society of persons of rank — many of them Peers — patrons of art some hundred years ago — called the Dilettanti Society, some of whose members went to Italy and brought over many treasures of art, many of which now adorned their Lordships' mansions. In early times a body of painters were associated with the society; it was agreed that from the members of the Dilettanti Society the President of the Royal Academy should always be taken. There then was a purely lay element; it did, therefore, seem strange that the Royal Academy should forget the fact, and he hoped they would not be unwilling to reconsider their decision in that respect. He was convinced the Royal Academy would derive great advantage from the admission of the lay element. He might be allowed to quote the reply given by Mr. Herbert, whose works they all so much admired, to one or two questions put to him by the Royal Commission with reference to this point. He is asked by the Chairman—

"I am to understand that you wish those eight gentlemen to be in your senate, some gentlemen being added who were not artists?—I think it would not be a bad thing at all. Do you imagine the artists and the non-artists would act cordially together?—I should think educated gentlemen who had a love for art would act well with the artists in such a body. Would not artists feel a little disinclined to see questions relating to art decided by those who had not the same advantage as themselves as regards artistic education?—I do not think so. I should like it rather than otherwise, for my own part. What is called art education I believe often shuts off from the free sight of nature, and is frequently in the artist's way of fixing upon the fit and appropriate thing to be done."—p. 517.

It was the same with men of letters and men of public business — their association was most advantageous to all parties. The British Museum, whatever might be its defects, was on the whole well conducted by a number of gentlemen who were not professional men of letters, but dilettanti. In the interests, therefore, of the Royal Academy itself, he would urge upon the Academicians the reconsideration of their opinions in this matter. With respect to that other question — namely, whether equal authority should be given to Associates with Royal Academicians, he thought the Royal Academy was entirely in the right. If there was to be anything like a hierarchy in the Royal Academy, there must be some distinction of authority and power between the Associate and the Academician; and if it was desirable to hold out some continuing object of ambition to a rising artist, it was well that some material distinction should exist between the two ranks. If anything, he thought the Royal Academy was too large; he did not wish to increase its numbers; and the object of ambition held out to the young and ardent of admission to its ranks should not be too easily attained. He expressed his great admiration of the general conduct of the Royal Academy, and they well deserved everything that could be bestowed on them by the favour of their Lordships and the beneficence of the Crown.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND wished to make one or two remarks, particularly after the decision which had been come to elsewhere with regard to the question of site for a National Gallery. A national collection of pictures offered two objects of inspection to the public, the works of the Old Masters and those of the moderns. Now the public were much better able to appreciate the pictures in the Royal Academy than those in the National Gallery. They could understand the ordinary incidents of daily life which the painters of the present time set before their view; but the paintings of the Old Masters reflected the incidents of past ages which the ordinary public could not appreciate. On this account he highly approved of the recommendation of the Commissioners, that the Academy should be thrown open to the public one day in every week—Saturday—free of charge. Another object of a national collection of pictures which he thought in the late discussion had been lost sight of, was for the purposes of study by artists themselves. They were the parties most interested in the ancient pictures, and it was of the greatest possible importance that, whatever site was fixed, it should be one where artists could study quietly the great works of the ancient Masters. Whether the paintings in the National Gallery were to remain where they now are, or were to be sent to Burlington House, they ought to have more room given to them; for at present the pictures were crowded together in such a manner that they could not be seen. He hoped the Government would take good counsel with respect to the architectural requirements of the new building. When a manufacturer erected a building, if it were not a handsome structure, he might say that it answered very well for the business purposes for which he built it. But it was a very different case with a department of Science and Art, which might fairly be expected to have some regard to the architectural effect of the buildings it erected.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, as a member of the Commission that had reported on the subject, he desired to express his obligation to the noble Earl who had called the attention of the House to this subject. It was one of great importance, and he hoped that the Lord President would be in a position to say that at any rate negotiations were about to be opened with the Royal Academy with a view to their removal from Trafalgar Square to the site of Burlington House. The works of the Old Masters in the national collection were now so huddled together that they could scarcely be seen, and some of the pictures were hung close to the ceiling. The same was the case with the Turner Gallery. The students, also, in the life school were packed together in a pepper box, in such a manner that it was impossible they could study to any profit. There was no doubt that the Royal Academy had a moral if not a legal claim to some accommodation at the public expense; while, on the other hand, it was right that the State should exact some conditions from them in return. The noble and learned Lord (Lord St. Leonards) said that the Royal Academy had put forth very strong arguments on the question as to the introduction of the lay element among them; but he had looked through the evidence on that point and had found, he would not say the preponderance of the artist evidence, but the preponderance of the general evidence to be in favour of the lay element. He thought that between the new Associates and the members of the Royal Academy there would be the most harmonious working, and that the admission of the Associates to a status in the senate of the Academy would remove the stigma which was supposed to attach more or less to a close corporation, and would take away the reproach which the enemies of the institution always threw in its teeth. It was, therefore, in his opinion, rather shortsighted in the Council of the Royal Academy not to have adopted that portion of the Royal Commissioners' Report. Besides the question of the lay element and the enlargement of the constitution of that body, there were several other important points that deserved the serious attention of the Government. The Government could not separate itself altogether from the Royal Academy, for it could hardly be suggested that it should agree to give them accommodation at the public expense, and yet retain no control over them.

LORD OVERSTONE said, that the less the Government intermeddled with the Academy, with the view of forcing the lay element into the constitution of that body, the better; otherwise the result must be to bring about the state of things which would answer to the poet's description of chaos—

“ Corpore in uno,
Frigida pugnabant calidis, humentia siccis,
Mollia cum duris, sine pondere habentia pondus.”

He could bear testimony to the valuable services of Sir Charles Eastlake, in the formation of our present National Gallery. He had succeeded in obtaining a valuable and useful collection of pictures—not yet complete as a public collection, but selected with great discrimination and judgment—but they could not be appreciated till they were placed in a proper site. With respect to the removal of the National Gallery to Burlington House, he could only say that having felt it to be his duty, as one of the trustees of that institution, carefully to examine the plans for carrying out that scheme, he had come to the conclusion that, so far as space and light and the facility of providing for the public convenience were concerned, as well as other considerations of great importance, a gallery might be erected on that site with which no existing gallery in Europe could enter into competition. By a most unfortunate vote of the House of Commons, however, that scheme was rejected, and what course would now be adopted he was unable to say. He hoped, however, that the Government would, during the approaching recess, take up the matter energetically, and that they would give the country a building worthy of the collection of pictures which the nation now possesses.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought it impossible to have listened to the discussion without being convinced that the subject was one which might with advantage be discussed in their Lordships' House. The proceedings of the Royal Academy were, very properly, influenced by public opinion, and for the purpose of forming that opinion it was quite right that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Stanhope) should have made the observations which he had done, characterized as they were by the utmost kindness of feeling towards that institution. It was impossible, he might add, not to be aware that the Royal Academy, numbering as it did among its members so many eminent artists, held a very important position in this country, and exercised a great influence on art. That being so, the Government had deemed it advisable to issue the Commission of which the noble Earl was Chairman, and which made a very able Report last year. That Report was referred by the Secretary for the Home Department to the Royal Academy, that they might make on it any observations which they thought proper; and the Academy, availing itself of an undoubted privilege, had addressed, through their President, a personal communication to the Queen on the subject. Her Majesty, feeling as strongly as she always had done with regard to the privileges of the Academy, was glad to receive that letter, to which she deemed it right to return an answer through her responsible Ministers; and both the Report of the Commission and the observations made upon it by the Academy were under the consideration of the Government. The noble Earl, he might add, had put to him two questions, one being with respect to the plan which the Government might adopt for giving additional space to the Royal Academy; and in answer to that question he might say that everybody seemed to concur in the opinion that the Academy required more space. With the view of providing it, a scheme, which had been spoken of in different terms that evening, but which would undoubtedly give greater space not only to the Royal Academy but to the National Gallery, was proposed; but it was rejected by the other House of Parliament. It had been said that if the late Government had continued in office their plan would have been carried, but when he took into account that there was a majority rather of antipathies than of sympathies on questions of art, he could not help thinking that that plan would have shared a similar fate. Be that, however, as it might, the Government felt bound to submit to the decision of the House of Commons, and to endeavour to form another plan which would afford that accommodation which they had been precluded from affording in the way they desired. In reply to the second question of the noble Earl, as to whether, upon granting any new site to the Royal Academy, the Government would be prepared to insist on certain changes being made in the rules of the Academy, and whether they would pledge themselves that those rules should be submitted to the decision of both Houses of Parliament, he would observe that he believed the Royal Academy did not admit that the Government possessed any power with reference to the alteration of their rules. He had gone over the Report, in which there were a great many suggestions made by the Commissioners, some of a nature so obvious as to be readily adopted by the Academy, others of an important character which had been rejected, and some which were more for the consideration of the governing body of the Academy than for the decision of the House of Commons. He entirely concurred with his noble Friend behind him (Lord Overstone) as to the inexpediency of the Government mixing itself up with the Academy; but there were, nevertheless, certain recommendations made by the Royal Commission which ought not, he thought, to be dismissed without consideration. If the Government gave additional facilities to the Academy, they ought, in his opinion, on grounds of public interest, to endeavour to render the governing body satisfactory, not only to the public at large, but to the artists themselves; and it was perhaps desirable, by means of negotiation between the Government and the Academy, to seek to secure a more popular representation of the artists in that institution. That having been done, he thought all other matters should be left to the governing body for their decision. But still, he repeated, the Government ought to reserve to themselves the power of influencing the Royal Academy in the first instance. With regard to the pledge to which the noble Earl had adverted, he could only say that he preferred giving no pledge on the subject; but he had no hesitation in assuring him that it would receive the careful consideration of the Government.

ALKALI WORKS REGULATION BILL.

QUESTION.

LORD RAVENSWORTH, in putting the Question with regard to the operation of the Alkali Works Regulation Act, of which he had given notice, said, that two years ago a Select Committee was appointed at the instance of the noble Earl below him (the Earl of Derby) for the purpose of inquiring into the injuries occasioned by noxious vapours evolved in certain processes of manufacture. The inquiry had been conducted with great ability, and an Act dealing with the subject to a limited extent was passed. One main reason for his bringing the subject to the attention of their Lordships was, that when he was last at Newcastle he had observed with no small dismay that the tall chimneys in the neighbourhood of that large town were vomiting out volumes of smoke as dense as ever, and he began to doubt whether the Act really was operative. That Act enjoined that 95 per cent of the noxious gases should be disposed of by condensation before being passed into the air, and it also provided for the appointment of Inspectors and sub-Inspectors to see that its provisions were carried into effect. He had applied to a gentleman well qualified to give him information on the subject, who was a witness before their Lordships' Committee a year or two ago, and his Report was that the result of his inquiries showed a general concurrence of opinion that the alkali makers had been more careful, and that the Act had been certainly productive of great improvement. He was therefore willing to believe that the great volumes of smoke which he had seen issuing from the chimneys had been deprived of the noxious qualities; and with a view to ascertain how the Act was being carried out in other parts of the country, he wished to ask the Postmaster General, If he had received any information through the Board of Trade of the success of the recent Act of Parliament for mitigating the nuisance occasioned by noxious vapours from chemical manufactories?

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY was afraid that he could not give the noble Lord much information, as the Act had only been passed so recently, and the Inspectors were only appointed on the 1st of January last. He was able, however, to confirm what the noble Lord had stated as to the operation of the Act in the neighbourhood of Newcastle, and in many cases he was told not merely 95 per cent, but actually 100 per cent of the noxious gases was extracted. He was glad to say, too, that the manufacturers had shown a cordial desire to co-operate with Inspectors, and he had little doubt that before the end of the year all the manufacturers would have adopted the machinery of the Act.

THE EARL OF DERBY hoped that the success of the Act would so far remove the apprehensions expressed by the noble Lord last year as to the serious effect it would have on the manufacturers, that he would be ready to go on and extend it to other trades which, though equally noxious, were not so prominently offensive as these alkali works.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that his apprehensions were confined to the extension of the Act to other manufactures. He had felt no apprehensions as to the alkali works, because there was a machinery existing which the manufacturers were ready to use.

THE EARL OF DERBY suggested that, as the noble Lord had now purified the air, he might now go on to purify the water.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, he was informed that the discharge of noxious matter into the river at Newcastle was enormous.

POLICE IN THE PARKS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. HARDY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the fact that the Police are not employed in Saint James's Park as they were in the Green Park and other Parks; and, if so, why that is the case; and whether frequent complaints have been made to the Home Office of the proceedings which take place from want of police supervision in Saint James's Park?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that since 1840 the ordinary police had not been employed in the enclosed part of St.

The Earl of Derby

James's Park (which he believed was the part the hon. Member referred to) as distinguished from the road, the Mall, and Birdcage Walk; and the reason was that the enclosed part was on the same footing as Kensington Gardens, and was under the charge of the First Commissioner of Works. The park keepers, however, were sworn in as constables, and had the same powers and responsibilities as the ordinary police. He was not aware that any complaints had been made to the Home Office, but he should inquire.

UNITED STATES—THE "KEARSARGE." QUESTION.

MR. CORRY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Admiralty would object to send a competent officer to Cherbourg to examine and report on the mode adopted to strengthen the sides of the Kearsarge against shot and shell, as described by Captain Semmes in his Letter which appeared in yesterday's Times?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, his right hon. Friend forgot that the Kearsarge had been in dock in this country, and they had the information desired. If his right hon. Friend wished, he would show it to him.

NAVY—THE COURSE OF THE "GLADIATOR."—QUESTION.

MR. DALGLISH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Transport which conveys the troops from Cape Coast Castle to the West Indies is likely to pass through a belt of 600 miles, in which only calms and light winds may be expected; and if the mean limit of the north-east trade wind in August is now considered to be in the 13th degree of north latitude?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, he was obliged to his hon. Friend for having put the Question, and he would state on what grounds the Admiralty had given their orders for the transport to proceed in the way she was about to do. Captain Richards, hydrographer to the Admiralty, in a paper dated the 21st of June, 1864, says with regard to the passage from Cape Coast to the West Indies—

"The middle-passage is simply the passage across the ocean from continent to continent, and, of course, any ship crossing from Cape Coast to the West Indies must make it. Either a sailing vessel, or a vessel towed by a steamer, or a steamer alone, leaving Cape Coast in July or August, bound for Barbadoes would steer to the southward for 300 or 400 miles, until she got into the south-east trade and out of the Guinea current, which sets along the coast of Africa to the eastward, at the rate of thirty miles a day. She would, if towed, get into the south-east trade in two or three days, and the equatorial current would then set her at the rate of thirty or forty miles a day to the westward. The south-east trade reaches to the northward of the equator in July, and she would make her westing with that wind, hauling to the north-west when she got into the meridian of 30 degrees W. (having run from 1,200 to 1,500 miles), by which course she might expect to pass through but a narrow belt of variable winds, and reach the north-east trade in 7 degrees or 8 degrees N., perhaps with no greater detention than one or two days. The distance between Cape Coast and Barbadoes is about 4,000 miles, and probably either a sailing vessel or a steamer would take a month to make it. A sailing ship like the transport employed should certainly make the passage as quickly as a paddle steamer. She would get into the south-east trade in three days from leaving Cape Coast, and once into that wind experience has always shown that sickness contracted on the Coast of Africa speedily disappears."

And he says likewise—

"In the days of Horsburgh ships crossed the belt of variable winds too far to the eastward, and, consequently, were much delayed. Modern experience has shown that by crossing the line well to the westward no such delays are experienced."

THE HIGHWAYS DISTRICT ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. DODSON said, he would beg to ask, Whether, under the Highways District Act of 1862, the towns not subject to the jurisdiction of the Board, but adjoining or surrounded by highway districts, are legal places for the meeting of the Board?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Under the Highway Act of 1862 some doubts existed on this point, but by an Amendment to the Local Government Act made last Session towns adjoining or surrounded by highway districts were constituted legal places for the meeting of the Highway District Boards.

ENSIGN FOR THE NAVAL RESERVE.

QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Crawford), he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any steps have been taken towards granting the privilege of bearing the "Blue Ensign" to Merchant Vessels commanded and partly manned by Officers and Men of the Royal Naval Reserve?

VOL. CLXXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, he had the pleasure to state, that Her Majesty had sanctioned the granting of the Blue Ensign to ships commanded and partly manned by men belonging to the Royal Naval Reserve, and that henceforth the White Ensign would be the ensign of Her Majesty's fleet. The Blue would be the ensign of ships of the Royal Naval Reserve, and the Red the ensign for the Merchant Service.

MR. CORRY said, he wished to know whether the flag list was to be no longer divided into the three squadrons of Red, White, and Blue?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the three distinctive flags were done away with, and there would be now only Rear Admirals, Vice Admirals, and Admirals.

ARMY—SANITARY REGULATIONS FOR FIELD SERVICE.—QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the Sanitary Regulations for Field Service issued by the Secretary of State, were obeyed before the Army took the field for the Ashantee War?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied, that the sanitary regulations referred to were included in the book of Medical Regulations which were directed to be, and he believed were, in the hands of every surgeon in the Army. It was specially laid down in these regulations, that the senior medical officer should be responsible for seeing that the sanitary regulations were carried out, and he had not received any Report to the effect that those regulations had not been carried out.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE DUTY ON MALT.—RESOLUTION.

MR. MORRITT said, the Motion he had to bring forward was one perfectly devoid of party considerations. It was,

"That in case of any modification of the indirect Taxation of this Country the Excise on Malt requires consideration."

He thought he should be able to prove to every Member of that House, that the proposition was reasonable, just, and equitable. All he required and asked was, that every hon. Member of that House, be he of whatever party he might, would do him the kindness to listen to what he had to say, and see if what he said was not borne out by facts, and then, after listening, to say if he could conscientiously vote against his Motion. That seemed to be taking rather high ground; but he stood on the justice of his cause. He was not going into statistics, nor would he weary the House by reading lengthy papers, but he would rely entirely on the justice of his cause. Now, he thought no man would deny that of analogous taxes the excise upon malt stood alone in one respect, inasmuch as it was almost the only tax that had not been modified or in some way altered. Whilst analogous taxes had been dealt with in some way the malt tax had not been touched. That singularity of position was one reason for considering the subject. But the malt tax had another peculiarity, and it was this—that it was a tax levied on the soil of England, upon an article which we produced or manufactured, and that which we within ourselves consumed. It was a tax that no one would deny fell heavily on the poor man who drunk a glass of beer. It was a tax that fell extremely heavy in that respect on the poor. The rich people who drank wine had been relieved to a certain degree by the remission to some extent of the tax on wine, but the poor man was still taxed heavily through his beer. No one would deny the next assertion, which was this, that the malt tax hung like a millstone round the farmer's neck. It checked him in his industry; it prevented the due course through which he would cultivate his land, and it prevented him from furnishing to his poor labourer that which would be a luxury to him. These were simple facts that were well known; but he would draw them together, and exhibit them to the mind of every impartial person, and ask him if he did not consider that such a tax was not worthy of consideration. One or two remarks had been made on the malt tax, on which he wished to make some observations. It had been said that the malt tax should not be interfered with, because it fell on the class of persons who were the least heavily taxed, and paid the least for the public benefit. He denied that, for it fell most heavily on a class of people who paid most to the general benefit of the State—he meant the agriculturists. Who paid the poor rate? Who paid the highway rate? Who paid the county rate? And who paid the church rate? These rates were all paid by the land. No doubt there were large manufacturers who paid considerably to the revenue, but look at their profits. Considering the profits of various classes, the agriculturist paid more than any other person to the revenue. There had been another observation made by persons high in authority. It had been his good fortune to receive a piece of friendly advice from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who advised him to consider that in any modification of the tax on malt the benefit would be greater to England than to Ireland or Scotland. That suggestion was made with a view, he presumed, to induce him to forego his Motion, but he was not disposed to do so, for certain reasons; and although that observation came from a gentleman whose every observation, from his experience and talent, would command respect, he did not think it was worthy of him. If the observation that they would be doing an injustice to Ireland or Scotland by granting a boon to England were worth anything, it must have been based upon the assumption that all the malt which was made in England was brewed in England, and that the beer was drunk in the same country. But the fact was that there was hardly a public-house in Ireland or Scotland in which you did not get English beer, and not many public-houses in England in which you did not get Irish and Scotch whisky. He believed that there was much more reciprocity of drink than was generally supposed. Even, however, if all the malt which was made in England was consumed in this country, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman was not a statesmanlike one. The tax, then, was levied on the poor, it was a burden on the agriculturist, it stood entirely alone, and it was levied on the producer and the consumer. He would say that if the exigencies of the State required that the tax should be maintained at its full extent—and if England had for the last few years a difficulty to make both ends meet—if the exigencies of the country had rendered this tax necessary, he would not for a moment have proposed a modification of it; but for the last two or three years they had been reducing the taxation, and that had been so done as to secure an increasing revenue, and as the surplus accrued it had been applied to the relief of various classes in the country; but the agriculturists had not yet had their share. What relief did the abolition of the paper duty give to the agriculturists? It gave relief to manufacturers in large towns, with whom it was no doubt a good thing to stand well at the elections; but fair play was a jewel, and he was anxious that if there was a surplus the agricultural interest should have a chance with the rest. It had been said that it was inexpedient to attempt to foreshadow the future, and that prospective legislation was inexpedient. He was prepared to admit that there was a good deal of truth in that; but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer made use of such an argument he ought to be consistent, and abstain from foreshadowings himself. He had not, however, done so. He had spoken of probable reductions of other taxes, and had foreshadowed, to his mind at all events, that the agriculturists would look in vain for any modification or consideration of the malt duty; and it was that circumstance which had induced him to bring forward his Motion and to take the sense of the House upon the subject. As regarded the requirements of the State, for the last two years they had been progressing steadily towards an increased surplus. That was no doubt to some extent brought about by the extreme good management of their financial Minister, for whose abilities he entertained the highest respect, but he thought it was very greatly owing to the extreme vitality of England herself. They saw around them on all sides evidence of increasing wealth. If they went out to Bayewater and Kensington and saw the magnificent houses built there and inhabited as soon as they were erected, they must feel there was an increase of wealth. In many instances it was derived from the colonies, but from whatever source it came there it was, and no doubt could be entertained of the increasing wealth of the country. They had been in flourishing circumstances in their adversity. Even during the cotton famine, and whilst paying so enormously for expensive ships and arms, they had had a surplus. No doubt that had been diminished to the present time by the cotton famine. But though we had been under a dark cloud, light was breaking in on our horizon. We were now getting into better circumstances, unless it pleased God that we should be engaged in war; but if we should be so engaged, and if it should be necessary to support the honour and integrity of England throughout the length and breadth of the world, he, for one, should never speak a word about the reduction of that or any other tax. But, under present circumstances, when we had a right to look forward to a constant, steady, and increasing surplus, he did not think he had chosen an inopportune occasion for bringing forward his Motion. It was in consequence of what had gone before that we had a right to expect, in case of any modification of indirect taxation, that the malt tax, instead of being treated with contempt, should receive due and proper consideration. He had thus endeavoured to convince the impartial mind of the House that his Resolution was a fair, an equitable, an honest, and a reasonable one. But there was one person in the House whom he would rather persuade than all the rest put together. He did not mean exactly that; but he would be proud, indeed, if he could persuade the right hon. Gentleman. He had heard it said that the constant contemplation of pounds, shillings, and pence—the adding up of accounts, the balancing of books, and the general endeavour to “make both ends meet,” although it produced a great deal of cleverness and subtlety, did not ennoble the man nor enlarge his heart. Judging, however, from the general attributes and character of the right hon. Gentleman, he would fain believe and hope that in his speech the right hon. Gentleman would demonstrate to the House that his occupation had in no way sullied or clouded that clear insight—with which he must have been born—into the difference between justice and injustice, between right and wrong. He was quite certain that if the right hon. Gentleman would allow his mind impartially to dwell on this subject, he would come to the conclusion that in future modifications of indirect taxes in this country, he having given a chance to every other class of taxpayers, the excise upon malt required consideration.

MR. DODSON seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “In case of any modification of the Indirect Taxation of this Country, the Excise on Malt requires consideration,”—(Mr. Morritt.)

—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, as it would appear from negative indications given by the House, that the debate was to be restricted within the narrow limits of a duel between the hon. Member (Mr. Morritt) and himself, he could wish that whether he succeeded or not in dealing with the argument in support of the Motion, he should be able to imitate the temper in which the hon. Gentleman had brought the subject before the House. The questions before the House were, on the one side, that in any future modification of indirect taxation the malt tax required consideration, and, on the other, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of Supply. In point of fact, the Motion of the hon. Member was met by another, which, according to the forms of the House, was equivalent in this instance to the "Previous Question;" and those who voted that the Speaker should leave the Chair would not pronounce a negative on the proposition of the hon. Gentleman, but would indicate in a Parliamentary way that they doubted whether the House should be called upon at present to pass any opinion upon the hon. Gentleman's Motion. It was not a negative of the proposition that the Government asked the House to pronounce, and he should be very sorry to go the length of putting a negative on it. The hon. Gentleman admitted that it was generally unwise to pledge the House beforehand to make a selection of subjects for remission of taxation at a period when they must be necessarily in the dark upon many questions which ought to bear upon the matter. The hon. Gentleman thought himself justified in the course he had taken by assuming that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) as the representative of the Government in matters of finance, had endeavoured by anticipation to exclude the malt duty from consideration. But such had not been his intention. It was quite true that in presenting his financial statement he offered a partial argument against the remission of the malt duty; but that was strictly and exclusively from one point of view—namely, from the competition in which the malt duty stood at that moment as the favourite subject of an important movement in the country, and with reference to the actual surplus at the time. It was not, therefore, that he wished the House to arrive at any conclusion with respect to its future course in regard to that tax. He would admit that, for a man standing in his position, it would be ten times more objectionable to endeavour to exclude the malt duty from the consideration of Parliament than for a private Member, and he was sure the hon. Gentleman would acknowledge that, when he spoke upon the question, he was reviewing several taxes which were thought fit subjects for reduction on account of the then existing surplus, and it was with respect to a comparison of the malt tax with the duties on sugar and tea alone that he used the argument. He trusted that he had disposed of the main ground which the hon. Gentleman urged as his justification for asking the House to do that which on general grounds was scarcely defensible—to pledge itself in a certain degree as to the disposal of the surplus not at present existing. The hon. Gentleman would not deny that the effect of his Motion was to establish that doctrine. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) admitted that it was capable of being alleged that the Motion, considered as an abstract proposition, in its terms, in the literal and grammatical meaning of its terms, was not only admissible but that it was incontrovertible—that in case of any modification of the indirect taxes of the country the excise duty on malt required consideration. Nothing could be more fair than to admit the proposition of the hon. Gentleman. But there were a great many propositions which were most fit to form the subject of an expression of opinion not only by private, but even by official men, which would assume an entirely new character when under peculiar circumstances they were placed on the Journals of that House, because it would be said, that though the propositions were true, yet it was not the business of that House to place upon its Journals all propositions that were true. And then the question would arise why, if the House thought fit to inscribe those propositions upon its Journals, it was not also fit to inscribe others equally true and pertinent to other matters? The duties upon tea and upon sugar were worthy of consideration, for though they had made a very large reduction in the duty upon tea it was still much heavier than the malt duty. He admitted the tea duty was a Customs duty, and therefore, as far as regarded form, was easier than a duty of Excise. But as far as restraint was concerned, a Customs duty on tea of 100 per cent was more restrictive than an Excise duty upon malt of a much lower amount. The meaning of the hon. Gentleman's proposition, as far as it was unexceptionable, was that it was the duty of the Government and of Parliament, from time to time when they had a surplus, to make an impartial review of the claims of various taxes for reduction. But, if the House were to affirm a Motion of that kind at once, it would carry it out of the region of literal truth, and render the declaration open to every objection which would lie against it as practically untrue. It was intended to anticipate a judgment on the subject, not wholly, but partially; and he put it to the impartial opinion of hon. Members whether such a decision ought to be anticipated at all. It was a great mischief to anticipate. It led to the creation of expectations which were in the nature of promises—promises from Members to constituents, from the House of Commons to the people. It might, perhaps, be said that he himself had made such promises. He could not admit that. It might be necessary, in support of particular proposals, in order to let the House comprehend their nature, that the consequences to flow from them should be indicated; but he had always protested, and he must always protest, against the practice of making a promise, or anything like a promise, in regard to such matters, as detrimental to the character and dignity of the House. He was sure the hon. Gentleman did not wish to lay up, for the future, causes of unnecessary dispute and contention. Experience, however, had shown that declarations of the kind, made in anticipation of circumstances which had not arrived, tended very considerably to aggravate political controversy when the time came. There was the case of the paper duty, for instance. It stood on record that the Resolution with respect to the paper duties, although of a very open character in its terms, was felt, in the result, an important Motion, though not a sole or conclusive one, in the selection of that measure of remission for a proposition to the House. But so far was it from being admitted that the declarations on that subject bound Government or Parliament in any degree, or justified the proposition which he made, there was rather absolute resentment at its being quoted, and the effect of it was to embitter the debate. He was not, of course, saying who was right or wrong in that case, but merely stating the effect of the abstract declaration. And now, he would ask, what sort of a surplus would be required in order to deal with the malt tax in an effectual manner? The House had for several years shown a strong inclination, not to lay down an unbending rule, but to adopt as a general practice the method of dividing any surplus between the subjects of direct and indirect taxation. He did not suppose the hon. Gentleman opposite would wish to commit the House to a Resolution to forego altogether the claims of the income tax, in order to apply the whole surplus to the reduction of the malt tax. [Mr. MORRITT: I limited my Motion to indirect taxation.] But if the hon. Member desired to deal with the malt tax, of course it must be in a manner that would produce some sensible effect on the price of the commodity. He would not be content with a reduction of less than a half. [Mr. MORRITT: I said a third.] The hon. Gentleman must take care that in trying to strengthen he did not weaken his argument, and lay his plan open to the objection, that while greatly diminishing the revenue it would leave all the evils of Excise restraint in force, and would not diminish the price of the commodity. He thought the general opinion was that the reduction of the malt duty by half was the minimum of change which it would be worth while to make. But for a reduction of between a half and a third they must have at command about £2,000,000, as the share of the surplus applicable to the diminution of indirect taxation. They were not so happy, however, as to have every year such a sum available for the purpose. Even a million, or half a million, was a large sum to have at command. The hon. Member spoke of millstones round the neck of the agriculturist, but they must take care not to impede the House of Commons in the discharge of its difficult duties by hanging millstones like that round its neck. They must take care not to expose the House to the reproach of bad faith, if it did not give preference to the malt tax, when it had at disposal a surplus capable of effecting great good if applied in other directions, but quite inappreciable and worthless when applied to the malt tax. They should endeavour to keep their honour clear and their words unambiguous in the face of the country; but the Motion was open to the objection of ambiguity, which was the most serious disadvantage which could attach to a legislative declaration. When it was said that in the reductions which had taken place of late years no relief had been given to malt, he must remind hon. Members of what took place thirty-five years ago. The country came out of the great war with France with a system of Customs duties wound up to the highest point on every article, oppressing, restraining—aye, in many cases, extinguishing trade and industry. In 1829, it was the good fortune of Parliament to possess a surplus of £3,000,000. Had that surplus been applied in the same manner as subsequent surpluses, for the relief of trade and industry, instead of being devoted to the reduction of the taxation on beer, a greater benefit would have been conferred on the country at large, and even that particular class which was interested in beer would have gained more by the increased strength and prosperity of the country through the general relief of trade. The repeal of that duty was a very strong measure, and certainly tended to weaken very much any residue of claims which might be made on behalf of that commodity to further relief. No other article had been relieved to the same extent as beer. In general terms, half of the duty weighing upon it was removed at once, and thus a benefit was given to England almost exclusively among the three kingdoms, and to a particular interest almost exclusively in England. The reduction of that duty was no doubt an advantage to the consumer, but it was a small advantage, indeed, compared to that he would have derived from the application of the money to the removal, in a more general manner, of the fetters on the trade and industry of the country. The hon. Gentleman had said that the malt duty was a millstone round the necks of the agriculturists; but, if so, he wanted to know what was to be thought of the duty upon spirits, which had an operation upon barley the same in principle as the malt tax, but in amount far more severe. Notwithstanding the repeal of the Corn Laws, the price of barley of late years had moved upwards instead of downwards, and while the malt tax was from 50 to 60 per cent upon malt, though not more than from 20 to 25 per cent upon beer, the spirit duty was from 400 to 500 per cent upon spirits. It would thus be seen that the millstone argument, if it had any weight at all, was far more applicable to the case of the spirit duty than that of the malt tax. The hon. Gentleman, again, had said there was no force in the argument derived from the pressure of the spirit duty and malt tax upon the three kingdoms. Every one knew that the great bulk of the malt tax was paid in England, but that, it had been said, was no reason why the tax should not be repealed. Certainly not, if the question was looked at in the abstract, and if the malt tax were an exceptional duty levied upon a commodity used in England, while the corresponding commodities used in Scotland and Ireland paid no duty at all. For example, if Scotchmen and Irishmen consumed not whisky but cider, upon which there was no duty whatever, the case against the malt tax would be immensely enhanced by its exclusiveness; but the truth was, Scotland and Ireland were far more heavily taxed in respect of their favourite liquor than England. Perhaps it was wrong that Scotchmen should drink whisky, but they must be allowed to judge for themselves, and he must say that whisky, when diluted into toddy, in which shape it was largely consumed, ought not to be made the subject of any very severe or sweeping condemnation. On the whole, then, he thought the House should pause before it gave a very large amount of public revenue to a commodity almost exclusively used in England, and, at the same time, left the corresponding commodities used in Scotland and Ireland under an overwhelming weight of taxation. But he did not think it desirable on the part of the Government that he should discuss this question at length. He had objected to embodying premature and unnecessary declarations of opinion in the shape of Resolutions, and he felt that the argument against the Motion of the hon. Gentleman had a tendency to lead him further than he should wish to go with respect to the merits of the question itself. It was desirable that the whole question of the malt tax should remain open and unprejudiced. At present he could not undertake to say what might be expedient for Parliament to do in future years. He had no means of ascertaining what sums might be at its disposal for the relief of the taxpayers, though on that point, apart from great convulsions, apart from special and extraordinary causes, he thought we might be justified in humbly entertaining sanguine hopes. It was to be hoped, therefore, that the House would carefully avoid embarrassing its future action by any premature declaration of opinion respecting the malt tax, and with the view of enabling it to do so, he had no hesitation in moving, as an Amendment, That the Speaker should now leave the Chair, which might be taken as equivalent to the previous Question.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he accepted, with pleasure, the admission of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the subject of the malt tax was entitled to serious consideration, but he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman should have subsequently hinted, by his mysterious allusion to the tea and sugar duties in the present, and to the beer duty in the past, that in his opinion the repeal of the malt tax would be inexpedient for many years to come. There could be no doubt whatever as to the impropriety of the House of Commons pledging itself beforehand to the diminution or repeal of any particular duty on financial grounds, but in the case of the Malt Tax there were social and political considerations which might render a departure from that general rule both justifiable and expedient. The Motion of the hon. Member for the North Riding was merely a supplement to that past system of fiscal re-arrangement which commenced in 1842, but which, in the opinion of those who represented the agricultural interest, was not carried far enough. Since 1842 every tax which was thought to press upon the springs of industry, or which affected any branch of our textile manufactures, had been altogether repealed. The particular ground on which these great changes—changes which caused great distress among the agricultural classes—were justified, was the broad political ground that if they were once adopted, all causes of dissension between class and class would be removed, and that henceforth the agriculturist and the manufacturer would not be divided into hostile camps. But so long as the malt tax remained untouched was it true to say that there was no class of producers, no class of manufacturers, affected—and unjustly affected—by our present system? It was impossible to deny but that on the producers of barley on the one hand, and the manufacturers of meat on the other, these restrictions pressed harshly and unjustly. It was often said with respect to the growers of barley on good barley land, that the malt tax did not operate in a prejudicial manner towards them when they had a good harvest. But what was that but saying that with a bad harvest, and on indifferent ground, the malt tax did operate injuriously? And is it for free traders to justify a tax which punishes producers for a bad harvest in the one case, and for managing their business as they think best in the other? He now came to the other class—the manufacturers of meat. Perhaps no occupation now open to the farmers of England, Ireland, or Scotland was more profitable than the manufacture of meat, but it was quite evident that the malt tax did operate as a great hindrance and drawback on the manufacturers of meat. That was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman in the Bill which he introduced to allow malt free of duty to be used for the feeding of cattle. It was said, and said truly, that that Bill was a dead letter. The grievance was admitted but not remedied, and never would be remedied, until the producer of barley could apply it to the production of meat in the way most likely to benefit himself in his trade. The right hon. Gentleman went on to consider the question as affecting the general producer, and said that unless the House abolished one-half of the malt tax he did not see that any good would result to the consumer of beer. It was not necessary to take into consideration at present the proportion of the malt tax which might be reduced in a future year. It was sufficient that the Resolution was sound in principle, and on that ground they were justified in supporting it. He believed that in the case of the malt duty, as in the wine duty, and all that class of duties, where there was a considerable reduction in the amount of duty there would be a considerable relief to the consumer, and that there would be a recovery of the revenue. Two years ago his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) whose absence, and particularly the cause of it, the whole House would regret, said, and said truly, that what wine was to the upper classes beer was to the lower, and consequently they had a right to argue by analogy from the effect of the diminution of the wine duties what would be the effect of the diminution of the malt tax. One of the most eminent and able permanent servants of the Crown, Sir Emerson Tennant, had published an elaborate treatise to show that if the wine duty was reduced the revenue would be permanently reduced; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not deterred by that prediction. In 1860 he reduced the duty, and in that year the total amount of gallons entered for home consumption was 7,272,308, and the amount of duty received was £1,828,998. He would pass over the next year, because the duty was then in a transitory state. The first year the new duties came into full operation the consumption had increased to 9,756,705 gallons, and the duty had fallen to £1,107,420. No doubt that was a most important and serious loss. But in 1864 the consumption had risen to 10,664,250 gallons, and the revenue to £1,233,824, showing an improvement in the revenue to the extent of £125,000 in three years. There was no reason to believe that a similar recovery would not follow a reduction of the duty on malt; a priori there was every reason to say that it would be more immediate and satisfactory. Every gallon of wine had to be produced abroad, and the consumption was liable to fluctuations from caprices in taste and habits; but beer and ale, which were produced at home, were as deeply rooted in the affections of the English people as anything could be. A writer in the first century had described the Britons as a people drinking fermented liquor made from barley, which was not known to any other people in Europe, and the earliest records of Parliament showed that one of its first Acts was to fix the maximum price of beer. There was no reason to doubt that the increased consumption of beer which would follow the reduction of the duty on malt would be greater than most people imagined. He was told that that might be so, but that the increased consumption of beer would decrease the consumption of spirits. He did not believe that in the least, and for the truth of that he would appeal to the figures which had been presented to the House. When the duty on wine was reduced and the consumption increased, did the consumption of beer or spirits fall off? Just the contrary. The duty on spirits during that period had increased about half a million, but the revenue on malt had remained stationary owing to the exorbitant duty. The House should remember this other illustration—that whereas in the first half of the last century the duty on malt varied from 7d. to 2s. 7d., and the population never exceeded 8,000,000, the consumption of malt was quite as large as the consumption during the first sixty years of the present century, when the population had risen to 20,000,000—and why? Because in the interval the malt had been quintupled. This showed that the duty on malt kept down the consumption, and the moment the malt duty was reduced there was every reason to believe that there would be a greatly increased consumption of beer and other articles produced from malt. The right hon. Gentleman had touched on what might be called the geographical or nationality argument. When he (Lord John Manners) first heard the argument he was startled. He had no idea that the principle of nationality had made such way in that House, and that we had to apportion our taxation by geographical considerations. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have been oblivious of geographical considerations in 1860, for he stood confessedly guilty of what he must now deem the great national crime of adding £2,000,000 of taxation on Ireland and Scotland, without imposing one halfpenny of taxation on England. In 1860 the right hon. Gentleman raised the duty on spirits to 10s. per gallon on 20,000,000 gallons, thus imposing the £2,000,000 of additional taxation to which he had referred. He presumed that at that time the right hon. Gentleman was not so impressed with his nationality argument; or perhaps, indeed, that he had not invented it. The right hon. Gentleman had talked about cider, and reminded the House that it was an untaxed drink. But how did that apply to the argument of nationality? There was a duty of 10s. per barrel on cider previous to 1830. It was then abolished, and what was the result? In fifteen years the consumption of cider had exactly doubled itself. Was the right hon. Gentleman, to redress the grievance of Scotland and Ireland and nine-tenths of England, to turn round on the cider counties and impose a duty of 10s. per barrel on cider? Let the House look for a moment into the question of nationality as it affected Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman said that in Scotland ardent spirits were the national drink. It was not a fortunate thing perhaps for Scotland that such was the case. But if spirits were the national drink of the people of Scotland, when and why did they become so? He had no doubt the House would remember the authentic ballad of King Arthur's Court, and the character of the servants he entertained, and the melancholy fate that befel those servants—

"Usquebaugh burnt the Irishman,
The Soot was drowned in ale."

Lord John Manners

He apprehended that there was nothing more clear than that at the commencement of the last century beer and ale were not only the drink of Scotch men but of Scotch women. In 1742 the Lord President Duncan Forbes addressed a memorial to the English Government complaining of the melancholy position into which the finances of Scotland had fallen, in which he said—

“The cause of the mischief we complain of is evidently the excessive use of tea, which is now become so common that the meanest families, even of labouring people, particularly in boroughs, make their morning’s meal of it, and thereby wholly disuse the ale which heretofore was their accustomed drink, and the same drug supplies all the labouring women with their afternoon’s entertainments to the exclusion of the twopenny.”

Why was the twopenny driven out of Scotland? The answer was that it was driven out by tea; but how came it that tea drove it out? The malt tax was imposed in Scotland in 1710, and what was the result? Why, in Glasgow, Leith, and all the great towns of Scotland there was bloodshed, and there arose a resistance of so formidable a character that the Peers of Scotland in London came together, and proposed a repeal of the Union between the two countries, and they were within an ace of succeeding, as they were only beaten by one vote. Therefore it was quite clear that in twenty years the people had been, against their will, driven to give up the drink they had formerly used, and taken to tea, upon which no duty was imposed until 1723. Therefore it was legislation of a fiscal character that had forced the people of Scotland to give up their old accustomed and popular drink to take refuge first in tea and subsequently in whisky; and, as legislation had done the mischief, Scotland had a fair right to ask that legislation should undo it. A few years ago he was walking in the classic groves of Keir with his hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire, when they came upon some men who were felling trees. He saw among the trees what he took to be an English cask, and, upon inquiring what it was, was informed that it was a cask of beer, which the men had asked to have instead of whisky. This was a most excellent change of taste, and for the sake of Scotland he wished that a great deal more beer was consumed there. Every hon. Member from Scotland ought to support the Motion of his hon. Friend, which might have the effect of substituting for the excessive use of ardent spirits the consumption of a wholesome beverage like beer. Let the House also look at Ireland. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary told them the other night that even in spite of the crushing effect of the malt tax, and the deleterious character of the beer supplied, the consumption had so largely increased that during the time he had been in the Irish office about 300 beershops had been opened in Dublin alone. That showed that the national bent of the Irish people was not exclusively towards spirits, and that if they could get beer they would be glad to consume it. Was there an Irish Member who had at heart the social improvement of the Irish people who would not gladly see the consumption of spirits considerably reduced by the substitution of beer? Then let them hear no more about the question of nationality. That which was good for England was good for Ireland and Scotland, and he sincerely trusted that all who had at heart the social, moral, and political welfare of the people of the three kingdoms would join together and present a firm front in favour of diminishing, and, they might hope, ultimately abolishing the tax, which was unjust in principle, unequal in operation, and productive indirectly of the worst effects in promoting the intemperance of the people. Another argument which he had heard used in the course of these debates was, that so great was the improvement in the beer brewed by the great brewers, and so great were the facilities which railway communication gave for the transmission of beer from the great brewers to different towns and villages, that there would be little recourse to private brewing even if the malt tax were repealed. To a certain extent that was true. Wherever there were large towns and convenient railway communication, it was probable that many of the class who fifty or a hundred years ago brewed would not now do so. But that was not true of many rural districts and places which had yet no railway communication. He was himself acquainted with a district in Shropshire in which, even under the disadvantages of the existing tax, the labouring people had never given up the habit of brewing. In that district every cottage that was built was provided with a proper brewhouse and copper. The farmers were in the habit of offering the labouring man 1s. a week extra, or half a bushel of malt once a month, and every labourer who had a copper chose the malt and rejected the shilling. If in any portion of the country they revived the habit of private brewing they would revive one which tended directly to increase the morality, happiness, and comfort of the labouring people. He would not now enter upon the question of the evil influence exercised by beerhouses upon the population. It was sufficient to say that every man who lived in the country knew that a great proportion of the smaller and a considerable amount of the greater crimes which afflicted the rural districts had its source in the beershop. He did not press that argument, but anything which tended to diminish the resort of the labouring man to the beerhouse did good to himself, to his family, and to the community among which he lived. He had to apologize to the House for having said so much, but on all these grounds of financial justice, of morality, and of increasing the comforts of the poor, he besought them to give a favourable hearing to the modest proposition of his hon. Friend.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART observed, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had exhorted them not to pass abstract Resolutions; but he would remind the House that the repeal or diminution of the duties on paper, advertisements, and wine had in each case been preceded by a Resolution of that character. There must be a considerable difference of opinion on the subject between the right hon. Gentleman and some of his Colleagues. Some years ago when the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to reduce the duties upon wine, he dwelt with great force upon the adulteration to which wine was subjected. The argument was equally applicable to beer, and if it supplied a good reason for reducing the duty on wine, then it ought to be good for the reduction of the malt duty. He thought that free trade agriculturists had been too long treated on the principle of "Heads, I win, and tails, you lose." He therefore hoped that at the next opportunity the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take their case into consideration and do them justice.

MR. NEATE, who had the following Notice on the paper:—

"That the owners and occupiers of land, by reason of the immunities from Taxation which they now enjoy, and the comparative lightness of the burdens to which they are subject, are not entitled to any priority of consideration on any review of the Taxation of the Country," said, he had to apologize for not being

present to move the Motion of which he had given Notice; but he had been under the impression that the House would not meet till six o'clock. He admitted that he had placed his Notice on the paper as a kind of challenge to the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), and he regretted that he had not been in his place to make it good. If he had had an opportunity of moving his Resolution, he should have observed that he could not regard the agitation for a repeal of the malt tax in any other light than as one intended for the benefit of the landed interests. It was true that it had been argued as a consumer's question; but he confessed he did not think the party opposite as the quarter where any great anxiety would be felt for the good of the consumer. Now he proposed to show that the agricultural interests enjoyed a great immunity from taxation. The most serious burden upon the land was no doubt tithe; but as to the poor rate, about which so much was said, he did not see how it was more a burden upon land than upon any other property. The agriculturists complained of the exemption of stock-in-trade; but, after all, what good would it do the agriculturists if that exemption were repealed? If there were a National poor rate there might be something in the question; but when the stock-in-trade of a parish was all of the same kind, it could not make any real difference; it would only make the difference between rating half or the whole of each man's property. No doubt land did contribute something, but it did not contribute to the same extent as personal property; and he thought it ought to pay up the arrears which were due from it in consequence of the unjust exemption it had so long enjoyed from the payment of probate duty. The land was in fact in the position of a man that presented a very small account to some one that had a very long account against him. He would do much better not to stir in the matter. One of the great questions that the next Parliament would have to consider would be that of direct as against indirect taxation. Now, the malt tax served as a buffer to shield the land from any attack; but if it were ever removed it would leave it defenceless against inquiry into inequalities from which it now benefited. ["Divide, divide!"] Did hon. Members who were crying out "Divide" really mean to act in the spirit of this Motion when they crossed the House? He believed they did not; and it was unworthy of a great party for mere electioneering purposes to hold out expectations which they never meant to fulfil.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he should vote for the Resolution, although he should not have done so if it had proposed an immediate interference with the revenue. With regard to the proposition of the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), implying that special exemptions were given to land, exceed in value the special burdens resting thereon, he had to say that whenever that hon. Gentleman should think fit to raise that issue, he (Mr. Newdegate) would be prepared to controvert the proposition. He should vote for the Resolution before the House, not merely with a view to the repeal of the malt tax, but with the intention of recording an opinion, that whenever a revision of taxation might be again considered, whenever there should be a surplus, which would render a reduction of taxation feasible, the subject of the malt tax should be considered not merely with reference to a repeal of the malt tax, but with reference to the position of the agricultural interest and the consumer as affected by the malt tax, and with a view to the adjustment of other taxation to the inequality produced by the malt tax if the malt tax is not repealed. It was for that purpose he gave his vote with the hon. Member for the North Riding in order to mark his sense of the injustice that would be done unless the incidence of the malt tax were considered in any future adjustment of taxation.

LAW OF JERSEY.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he rose to call attention to the system pursued of removing paupers and persons under sentence of banishment from Jersey to the seaports of England, especially Southampton. He had previously brought the Question before the House upon a memorial from the corporation of Southampton, complaining that people under sentence for crime, and paupers, were provided with a free passage from Jersey, and shipped to Southampton and other ports, where they became a burden to the ratepayers. He had been happy to hear that with regard to Guernsey that statement was not correct, but with regard to Jersey he was fortified with documents in support of the complaint he made on behalf of Southampton. In 1847, the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the criminal law of the Channel Islands reported against the practice in question. The Jersey Civil Law Commissioners of 1859 also stated that strong representations had been made to them of the hardship to which the poorer classes who were not natives of Jersey were liable—of being at once removed from the Island to the place of their birth if they should become chargeable upon the rates. That was, they added, not only a great hardship upon the labouring classes, by whose industry the Island had for a long series of years been benefited, but also upon the port of Southampton, to which these paupers usually found their way. He had placed himself in communication with the authorities of Southampton; and by a letter from the clerk to the Board of Guardians, dated the 1st of June, 1864, it appeared that there was no doubt that since July, 1861, to December, 1863, no less than thirty-two persons either under sentence of banishment, or paupers who had no settlement in Jersey, had in this way been deported, become chargeable to the rates, and in that time cost the parish not less than £250. He had also been favoured with a letter from a resident in Jersey, whom he had asked whether persons belonging to the criminal class were allowed the privilege of a free passage. That gentleman replied that occasionally in cases before the Royal Court persons on promising to leave the Island were allowed to go without being sentenced, or after receiving very slight sentences. Another gentleman, who had published a work on the laws of Jersey, wrote to him stating that banishment from Jersey meant simply transportation to England; and that though the law had in practice been somewhat modified, so far as the severer penal cases were concerned, yet it might be revived and put in force at any time. That gentleman also mentioned an instance of some persons from Jersey being sent to the English hulks, where they were disposed of according to the English practice, and at English expense. Free passages were given to paupers, who were thrown on the shores of this country, and became chargeable to the English rates; but he admitted that the paragraph in a petition he had formerly presented, stating that burglars and offenders of a high character were banished to England, was inaccurate. He begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, whether he has received any Report upon the subject from the Lieutenant Governor of Jersey?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that when the hon. and learned Gentleman brought forward the subject some time ago he (Sir George Grey) stated that he had only received a report from the Lieutenant Governor of Guernsey, but not from the Lieutenant Governor of Jersey. He had, however, recently received a report from Jersey, upon the memorial of the corporation of Southampton. The memorial referred to the removal of persons charged with some crime to this country—he did not think it entered into the question of the removal of paupers—and therefore the Report of the Lieutenant Governor related only, he believed, to criminals or persons charged with crime. The best way of affording the House full information upon the subject would be to produce the memorial of the Town Council of Southampton, the letter referring it to the authorities of Jersey and Guernsey, and the Reports of the Lieutenant Governors of those Islands. If the hon. Gentleman would move for those papers they would be produced. But there had been in addition a correspondence conducted by the Poor Law Board with reference to the removal of paupers, which was quite a distinct question, but he had no doubt that that might be produced also.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY (IRELAND). QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, When he will lay on the table of the House the promised Bill for regulating and reforming the Irish Court of Admiralty, and what his intentions are with regard to that measure? It would be remembered that a Bill was introduced by himself last year to assimilate the jurisdiction and practice of the Irish Court of Admiralty to those of the English Court, and in that course he was sustained by memorials and petitions from some of the foremost commercial bodies in the United Kingdom, including Lloyds, the Chambers of Commerce at Liverpool, Glasgow, and Manchester. The Court of Admiralty in England had been reformed several times with great advantage, its jurisdiction having been enlarged and the procedure simplified; and it was very necessary that the Irish Court should undergo similar amendment. Some difficulty might, perhaps, be raised by the Treasury, but the sum required was insignificant compared with the great benefit which would be secured to the commerce of the country. He withdrew his Bill on the understanding that the subject should be investigated by a Commission, which was then inquiring into another branch of the legal system of Ireland. After a very careful examination of the matter, the Commissioners reported very strongly in favour of an assimilation of the Irish Court in jurisdiction and practice to the English one. The reform in England had led to such an increase of business that, although the fees had been individually reduced, they had risen in the aggregate from £2,400 to £9,500 a year. The Commissioners were against the proposal to attach the jurisdiction of the Irish Admiralty Court to a Court of Common Law, and declared that it was desirable in the interests of shipping and commerce that the Court should, in accordance with the terms of the Union, be retained as a distinct and separate tribunal, exercising jurisdiction in Ireland in the same way and to the same extent as the Court of Admiralty in England. The Commissioners also reported that there was an almost universal concurrence of opinion among the classes interested in favour of the assimilation which they recommended. The jurisdiction of the Irish Court was at present very limited in many respects as compared with that of the English one; and a ship at Cork or Dublin did not enjoy the same advantages as at Liverpool or any other English port. A most objectionable practice also prevailed in Ireland, of allowing the registrar to detain in his possession during the trial of a case any money deposited in the Court. The salary of the Judge was much too little, and ought to be increased. As to compensation to the prosecutors on account of a change in the system, it would not exceed £1,500 a year. He begged to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, what he intended to do in regard to this important subject?

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said in reply, that, as one of the Commissioners, he could only endorse the Report, which, however, had only been issued a few days ago. He could assure the hon. Member that he took a strong interest in the matter. Not a moment should be lost without the subject being considered, although he could not pledge himself that the state of public business that Session would afford an opportunity for legislating during the present year.

BILL.—[BILL 159.]—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg leave to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the discrepancies which, he contended, existed between the Bill and a Bill introduced last Session with respect to brewers. On a former occasion the Chief Secretary for Ireland said that it would not be wise to assimilate the laws of England and Ireland on this subject; but in the present Bill there was a proposal for uniformity. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would state why the Irish brewers were included in the measure. He also wished to ask for explanation as to the 16th clause, which deprived magistrates of the power of allowing a person convicted of illicit distillation a few days for the payment of the penalty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that hon. Members would readily understand why he had not made any statement on the Bill. It consisted of twenty clauses; but as no two of them related to one subject, he thought the better course would be to treat the Bill clause by clause. With reference to Clause 16, objected to by the hon. Member for the King's County, he would agree to postpone it, and the discussion could be taken on it when bringing up the Report. The 9th and 10th clauses merely facilitated the execution of the law; they imposed no new burden, and did not interfere at all with the provisions of the new Beer Act. One of them, indeed, would confer a great benefit upon licensed victuallers in Ireland, for it would allow them for the first time to brew their own beer.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 8, inclusive, were agreed to.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN referred to an understanding with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a previous occasion, that upon the introduction of the present measure the half yearly licences of Irish hawkers should be obtainable on the same principle as those obtained by English hawkers.

Clause 9 (Sections 54 to 65 of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 52, and so much of Section 13 of the 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 68, as relates to Brewers in Ireland, repealed).

MR. HENNESSY said, that the clause must interfere with the Beerhouses Bill, because the Government recommended that Bill as exceptional legislation, which, they said, was necessary for Ireland, while the clause declared that it was expedient that the laws relating to brewing should be made uniform throughout the United Kingdom.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that as the Bill was only delivered to hon. Members on the 18th inst., and no opportunity had been given to the brewers of Ireland to see and consider it, he should like to have some explanation as to its objects.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could only repeat the explanation which he gave before the Speaker left the Chair. He was willing, however, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman desired it, to take care that there should be an opportunity of discussing on the Report any clauses the meaning of which he did not understand. The Bill had nothing to do with the Beerhouses Bill, one being of a fiscal character, and the other relating only to police regulations.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 (Extension to Ireland of certain provisions relating to Brewers in England).

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask for some explanation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is comprised in what I have said.

MR. HENNESSY: See how the Chancellor of the Exchequer is treating me! What is "comprised?"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The statement which I made related to both clauses. They have both the same subject-matter.

MR. HENNESSY: That was a little irregular. The clause extended to Ireland certain sections of various Acts of Parliament, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to tell the House what would be the effect of them when applied to Ireland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. Gentleman had taken a course which was totally without precedent in that House. The regulations under which trades which were liable to revenue inspection were conducted were of the most voluminous character, and to call upon him to make such a statement as he had been asked for, and to read, as the hon. Member had done, to the House clauses which did not in the slightest degree explain themselves, was an abuse of the time and patience of the House. The hon. Gentleman had not raised a single definite objection to the clauses. When he stated that he objected to Clause 16, he immediately offered to postpone it, and he would have done the same with these clauses if any reason had been shown for taking such a course. Legislation of a complicated character could not be discussed in all its details, and he must decline to enter into all the details. He had already stated the general effect of these clauses. If objections were taken he would gladly meet them, and he would postpone the clauses if necessary; but he hoped the time of the House would not be wasted by pursuing the present discussion.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he had gone through the clauses, and could say that there was nothing objectionable in any one of those which it was proposed to extend to Ireland.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought this a peculiar mode of legislation. The right hon. Gentleman was asked to state the effect of the clauses.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The effect has been stated.

MR. HENNESSY: No description of them whatever was given.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that if the Attorney General for Ireland would state that he had gone through all these Acts and could say that they were unobjectionable, he should be satisfied.

COLONEL FRENCH said, all that was wanted was that there should be a plain statement of what the Act would do.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would postpone the clauses until the Report if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would promise in the interim to read the sections and make up his mind whether they were objectionable or not.

COLONEL DUNNE said, the proposal was merely to substitute the precautions practised in England for those practised in Ireland, and he really could not tell which were the more effectual. The chief objection seemed to be that so short a time had elapsed since the Bill was before the House that the Irish brewers really would not have time to consider the effect of those provisions.

MR. HENNESSY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when appealed to for an explanation, had said that those clauses referred to some fiscal regulation; but he would inform the right hon. Gentleman of the scope of his own Bill. The effect of it would be in one instance to repeal an Act which prohibited adulteration, in the face of a recent statement by the Government that the adulteration of beer was increasing in Ireland. That was one mistake, and another was that a Bill only brought in on the 17th of June, which proposed to inflict on Irish brewers all the regulations existing in England, should be forced on by the Government without explanation, while, when a humble Irish Member asked for explanation, the right hon. Gentleman adopted a tone which was unworthy of his high position. In order to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of looking into the Acts whose provisions he had incorporated in the Bill, but which he had evidently not read, he would move that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made and Question, "That the Chairman do Report Progress,"—(Mr. Hennessy,)—put and negatived.

MR. HENNESSY said that, having appealed in vain to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for an answer, he now put the question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman, he thought, rather misunderstood his own position, and ought to have taken a lesson from what occurred not long ago. Having put upon the Notice paper several Amendments to one of the fiscal measures of the right hon. Gentleman, when it came on for discussion at a late hour a Motion of adjournment was made, and the right hon. Gentleman said—

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was not in order in referring to what was said in a former debate.

MR. HENNESSY said, he thought that he was speaking strictly to the question. With regard to a Bill imposing restrictions similar to those contained in that at present before the Committee, he had ventured to move the adjournment of the debate. The right hon. Gentleman on that occasion said, that "an hon. Member who knew nothing of the subject had moved the adjournment of the debate." What was the result? On the very next stage the Bill was thrown out by a majority of four. It was a much more satisfactory mode of conducting business, that when explanations were asked for, they should be given at the time.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 78.]—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. LONGFIELD said that, bowing to the decision of the Speaker, that it was competent to re-commit the Bill, he intended to move that it be referred to a Select Committee. When the Attorney General for Ireland fixed the Bill for a morning sitting, objections were raised by Irish Members on that (the Opposition) side, from the feeling that they would be deprived of the attendance of English Members, upon whose good sense they relied to defeat what they considered to be a job. All the Irish Members who had given notice of Amendments were also engaged upon Committees, and then no fair opportunity for discussing the Bill would be afforded at morning sittings. It could not be expected that they would make a House to carry a job by which the Irish Members of the Administration were to be benefited. The right hon. Gentleman, however, did not consider the motives he (Mr. Longfield) had urged sufficient to induce him to alter his arrangement; but he fixed the Bill for a Tuesday morning sitting, when there were several Orders standing upon the paper. With some difficulty he (Mr. Longfield) left his Committee with a view of moving, if possible, the Amendment of which he had given notice. The Speaker, with his usual punctuality, was ready to take the Chair, but a House was not made till after half-past twelve. He could not longer absent himself from his Committee, which had not a quorum in his absence, and he had no option but to surrender. Defeated by the adroit generalship of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he could not then bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice, and was obliged to reserve himself for another occasion. He had now, therefore, to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. He entirely agreed with an able writer in the leading journal, that such was the only course, and it was quite a competent course for the House to pursue. The Bill contained 192 clauses, and embraced all manner of technicalities referring to the constitution, practice, procedure, and administration of the Court of Chancery in Ireland. The House was incompetent to deal with such a subject. Unhappily it involved also questions of patronage and jobbing, which a Select Committee upstairs was most competent to deal with, but which a Committee of the whole House, backed by all the power of the subterranean brigade, could not force through. If the Bill were really a bonâ fide measure, intended for the improvement of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, the House might feel assured that the Government would have no hesitation in referring it to a Select Committee. The Bill consisted of five different parts. The first and most important was the nomination of a Vice Chancellor, and the abolition of the Masters of the Court of Chancery. The others related to the procedure and practice of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and to the superannuation and patronage of the different departments connected with the Court. The Bill, if passed, would add about £10,000 a year to the expense of the administration of justice in the Superior Courts in Ireland. At present the staff of Judges in Ireland numbered, as in England, twenty-two, with only one-tenth of the business. Besides, in Ireland they had the advantage of the four Masters, who were, in truth, Vice Chancellors, though with but small salaries, with which they appeared to be content. Shortly after the Court of Chancery in England had been reformed it was thought good to attempt to reform the Court of Chancery in Ireland on the English model. An Address was moved in the other House praying for the issuing of a Commission to inquire into the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, with a view to diminish the cost to the suitor and the expenditure of the public money. In 1855 a Royal Commission sat, and recommended among other things the abolition of the Masters of the Court and the Commissioners of the Incumbered Estates Court, and the appointment of two Vice Chancellors. In 1856 a Bill on the subject was introduced into that House by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, and a second Bill was at the same time brought in by the Government. Those Bills, involving the question of patronage, were referred to a Select Committee, on which sat Sir J. Graham, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Henley, the Law Officers of the Crown, and other eminent men; in fact, an abler Committee could not have been found for the task intrusted to them. The Committee was unanimously of opinion that those Bills were unadvisable, and they were accordingly dropped, and the country cheerfully acquiesced in the decision of the Committee, virtually superseding the unfortunate recommendation of the Royal Commissioners as to the appointment of Vice Chancellors. That Committee recommended, instead, a plan that was acceptable in Ireland and more economical. In 1861, however, another Royal Commission on the same subject was issued; and, to show the House how these things were managed, he might state that the new Commission included six of the very same Gentlemen who had sat as members of the former one. Of course, under those circumstances there could be but one result, namely, that the Commissioners would adhere to their preconceived opinions, and arrived at the conclusion at which they had an interest in arriving. He imputed to those Gentlemen, two of whom were in that House, nothing but what the House imputed to every Member in it when his interest was one way and his judgment was likely to be in the same direction. It required a declaration from every man before it allowed him to sit on the most insignificant group of railways that he had no personal interest himself, and that his constituents had none in the matter referred to him. The House knew that its Members were of the human race, and it took proper precautions against the operation of natural bias on their judgments. That, however, was not done in the case of the Royal Commission of 1861, which was so constituted that it was impossible it could be impartial. But that was not all. The English Commissioners knew nothing of the Irish Court of Chancery, and the Irish Commissioners knew nothing of the English Court; yet they had to consider how they might reduce the cost to suitors, keep down the expenditure of public money, and devise the best system of Chancery procedure. Not being competent themselves to do what they had been appointed to do, they began by at once selecting from the Irish Bar a gentleman of the highest capacity and skill to enlighten their confessed ignorance by drawing up for them an essay on the practice of the Irish Court of Chancery; and the same course was taken in regard to English Chancery practice. It certainly did seem ludicrous that when Royal Commissioners were chosen to inquire into a subject they should get other persons to do it for them. When the essays were printed they formed an octavo volume of some 400 pages, and he would charitably assume, though there might be room for doubt on the point, that all the Commissioners had read it. The Commissioners also sent a number of queries to some forty members of the Irish Bar, most of whom, having something else to do, took no notice of them. To reduce the cost of the suitors, or the expenditure of the public money, was wholly forgotten; but they did not forget the assimilation of the practice of the Court of Chancery in Ireland to that of the English Court of Chancery, because that assimilation would involve the abolition of efficient Judges in Ireland and the creation of new ones. But they did not ask a single question of any person who was acquainted with the practice of the English Court of Chancery. The Attorney General had frequently told the House that the proposed change would result in a saving, but there were such awkward things as facts and figures, and he would be a sanguine and a credulous man who should think that there would be any saving whatever, even a prospective one. The new offices immediately contemplated, of one Judge, half-a-dozen chief clerks, and half-a-dozen junior clerks, would form a present addition to the burdens of the country of £10,000 a year. The superannuations would be upwards of £11,000, for the influential gentlemen would be superannuated on full salaries, while the others would have to be content with two-thirds. And all that was irrespective of the building job. At the end of fifteen or twenty years, when those gentlemen who lived at home and enjoyed either their full salaries, or two-thirds of them died, then a saving to the public might, perhaps, commence; but that was problematical, because there was another clause in the Bill which authorized the creation of additional clerks from time to time, with the consent of the Treasury. If there was one way in which money could be spent mischievously and corruptly in Ireland, it was by adding to the Irish Judges. No one believed that new Judges were wanted; it was too absurd. But they were told that such was the recommendation of a Royal Commission. But how had the House dealt with the recommendations of various Royal Commissions before? The recommendations of the Royal Commission that sat ten years ago were afterwards referred to a Select Committee, which did not sanction them. They had the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade for refusing to adopt the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Harbours of Refuge, on the ground that it was not impartially constituted, and that its members had an interest in carrying out a particular plan. And then there was the instance of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into certain public institutions in Dublin, who recommended the extinction of the Museum of Irish Industry.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present—

MR. LONGFIELD resumed: The Royal Commissioners who investigated the subject, recommended the abolition of the masters in Chancery, and the substitution for them of a vice chancellor and chief clerks. That they had done entirely regardless of the cost to the country. They had not reported any evidence showing that the assimilation of the Irish and English practice would be judicious; but the Report exhibited on its very face that the idea was a preconceived one. The result would inevitably be that three of the Royal Commissioners would be provided for under the present Bill. Was that a Commission whose recommendations ought to be attended to? In that way the Royal Commissioners were voting themselves placemen to be paid by the public money, which they were told to save. He conceived that the House ought not to refuse to send the Bill to a Select Committee, the Members of which would be able to judge by evidence whether the measure would effect a public saving or not. It had been said that the Bill was for the good of Ireland; but there might be different opinions on that point, though it was certainly good for the Royal Commissioners. Indeed, when the Commissioners took upon themselves to declare the wishes of the people of Ireland, he was reminded of that French monarch who said, "I am the State," or the three gentlemen in Tooley Street, who claimed a right to speak in the name of the people of England. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin had shown that the Bill would be attended with a great increase of cost to the suitors, and was the House to be told that it must swallow the measure, which increased the public expenditure and disregarded the interests of the suitors? He contended that it was a case which ought to be submitted to the investigation of a Select Committee. He had on other occasions voted with some hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House to frustrate jobs. He had had the pleasure, in that way, of frustrating the South Kensington job; and if the result of sending the present Bill to a Select Committee was to postpone it, he would be glad, and still more glad if the Bill was altogether frustrated. A more senseless or extravagant project he never knew, and he moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he rose to second the Amendment. Considering the thin state of the House, he thought that they were performing a most solemn farce in now pretending to discuss the Bill. An hon. Member connected with Ireland had twice or thrice moved that the House be counted in order to get it fuller, for it was well known that the subterranean brigade were ready, upon the usual summons, to emerge at any moment from the infernal regions. So far as a reform of the Court of Chancery, which the Bill proposed to effect, was concerned, he could only say, speaking as a country gentleman, that the mode in which the business of that Court was at present transacted in Ireland was perfectly satisfactory. Theoretically Chancery business might be better transacted in England, but Irishmen wanted no change in their system of Chancery procedure. There were in Ireland three masters, men of high legal attainments, and he saw no good reason why those three men should be paid salaries for retiring while others were put in their places who could not give greater satisfaction. He, for one, objected to the change, and should oppose the Bill in every shape and form.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"
—(Mr. Longfield,)

MR. HUNT said, he did not propose to discuss the merits of the Bill, but simply wished to enter his protest against the mode of proceeding which its promoters had adopted, believing them, as he did, to be acting in contravention of the established usages of the House. The Bill having been disposed of as it had been on Tuesday last, in Committee of the whole House, ought not, he thought, to be brought forward again in the present Session. On the occasion to which he referred the hon. and learned Member for Clare had, it seemed, voted by mistake with the majority, but he could say for himself, and he believed also for one or two other friends of his, that they were likewise the victims of a mistake, inasmuch as they thought the bell which rang two minutes before four o'clock on Tuesday could not be the division bell, and did not in consequence come into the House and vote in favour of the Chairman's leaving the Chair, as he at all events intended to have done. If a Bill were referred to a Select Committee and that Committee pronounced against it, it was not, he believed, usual to proceed with it in the House, and he did not see why the case in which a Bill happened to be disposed of by a Committee of the whole House should stand on a different footing. He recollected that in 1861, when the second reading of the Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill was moved by Mr. M. Milnes, who had since been translated to a higher, and he hoped a happier sphere, he (Mr. Hunt) had moved a Resolution pointing out particular defects in it, but not amounting to its rejection, in the same way as the usual Motion made for that purpose. That Resolution he had carried by a small majority, and the Bill was disposed of for the time, but Mr. Milnes a few days after appealed to the Speaker to say whether he would be in order in proceeding with the measure that Session, and the decision was, that it was competent for the hon. Gentleman to appoint another day for the second reading; the Speaker, at the same time, however, informed him that when a Bill was defeated, as his had been, it was usual to take that defeat as an intimation that it should not again be pressed on the attention of the House. Now, the principle which governed that case applied, he thought, to the measure under discussion, and he hoped, therefore, its promoters would withdraw it from the cognizance of Parliament during the present Session.

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, that as the House had already heard on two or three different occasions the same statements and imputations made in almost the same words as they had listened to that evening, and as he had on those occasions replied to those statements and imputations to the best of his ability, he should not go over ground again which he had before trodden. As to his own position in regard to the Bill, he could only say that it was not a measure of his, or, properly speaking, of the Government. In submitting it to the House he was simply endeavouring to carry out the recommendations solemnly made of a Royal Commission of the highest authority. Complaints having been made for many years of the gravest character with reference to the constitution and practice of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, all men belonging to the profession, and all persons outside the profession competent to form an opinion, felt that a change was necessary. At the instance not of the Government, but of a noble Lord who, as far as his Resolution went, was acting not in community with, but in opposition to, the Government, it pleased the Crown, upon an Address from the House of Lords, to appoint a Royal Commission. The fact that he, as one of the Law Officers of the Crown, was a Member of that Commission would not preclude him from bearing testimony to the eminent men, the highest in their respective professions at either side of the Channel, of whom it was composed, among them being the Master of the Rolls, the Attorney General, Sir W. Page Wood, and the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), whose recommendations seemed to meet with but scant approval from his political friends. The Commission, after full and conscientious inquiry, reported that Ireland ought to enjoy the benefit of those successive changes in the law which in England had been attended with great advantage, and have worked so satisfactorily for many years past. It then became a matter not of discretion but of duty with the Government to act upon their recommendations, and to produce a Bill carrying them into operation. As Attorney General for Ireland he was now discharging that duty; and the Attorney General for England would stand forward in due time to propose a measure giving effect to the Commissioners' recommendations regarding this country. He asked the House to believe that the measure had been framed for the general welfare, and not for the benefit of this man or that man. In fact, he felt ashamed to listen to the miserable insinuations that were put forward. The Bill had not come by surprise upon the House. It was introduced many months ago, and at the request of his hon. and learned Friends opposite had been postponed week after week to afford ample time for consideration. He thought it rather hard under such circumstances that he should be met with a suggestion to withdraw it on account of the advanced period of the Session. In its various stages it had been encountered with most obstinate, most unreasonable obstructions; not even the ordinary courtesy of being allowed to introduce it without an elaborate statement had been accorded to him. The clauses of the Bill, with the exception of 20 or 25, were all clauses copied from English Acts, working with the utmost satisfaction in Courts of Equity. The Bar of Ireland were most anxious to see the measure passed into law, the committee of the Incorporated Society had adopted resolutions in its favour, and only the previous day a meeting of the profession determined unanimously to support it. Representing, therefore, not only a Royal Commission, but the Bar, the solicitors, and the public of Ireland, he asked the House to adopt this Bill. Undoubtedly, he had endeavoured to press on the Bill at a day sitting, but it was well known that he had endeavoured ineffectually to obtain Friday and not Tuesday for the purpose. He trusted the House would pass a measure intended to give the country relief to the extent of £4,000 or £5,000 a year, and to confer upon Ireland the benefit of the English system.

MR. WHITESIDE said, his right hon. and learned Friend had spoken with unusual ardour, considering that the subject of law amendment was one that generally tended to composure of the mind. As a young Member he would take the suggestion in good part, that the House was not absolutely bound by the recommendations of any body of men, even though they might include the Law Officers of the Crown. The question was simply, whether a number of new places should be created and a number of old ones abolished? His right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland had determined not to be bound by the decisions of the Committee and to persist in pressing on his Bill. He had rather attempted to take the House by storm than to persuade it by argument. It was quite true that a highly inconvenient day was fixed for the discussion of the question, when it was known that many Irish Members could not attend, and while he was collecting his books and papers Clause 11 was arrived at, and several good places created. He then exercised his undoubted right of stating his objections to the Bill, and the division was taken, in which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare got into somewhat of a scrape. He believed that if the hon. and learned Gentleman had been content with recording his own vote, and had been less zealous in canvassing for other votes for the Government, the accident would not have happened. His Motion that the Chairman leave the Chair, which he had no doubt he would have been very glad to do, was read early in the day, and he could not suppose that the Government were ignorant of its importance. The Committee knew what it meant, and after hearing the discussion decided in favour of it. He did not dispute the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman, that it was quite competent for the House to rescind what had been done in Committee; but Mr. May's book distinctly stated that, as a general rule, when the Chairman of Committee had been moved out of the Chair, the Bill was supposed to be dropped for the Session. It was perfectly ludicrous to represent it as a wrong to Ireland that there should be any delay in appointing a vice chancellor and train of officers, when there was no place for them to sit in and no business for them to do. Such a statement was too much for the patience of even so patient a man as himself. The names connected with the Select Committee which inquired into the subject carried with them as much weight as the names of the Commission. The Committee was not content with sending papers round to be filled up, but examined witnesses of great experience and authority; and, after a very careful investigation, decided that the existing tribunal was more useful and economical than the new one proposed. It was rather singular that the witnesses, whose evidence was not acted upon by the Committee, were appointed members of the Commission, and of course they supported their own testimony by reporting against the decision of the Committee. It had been supposed that the duties of the Commission were at an end; but he had, to his surprise, received a letter from Mr. Napier stating that the Commissioners were to meet in London in the first week of July to settle the official establishment of the Court of Chancery. Who could have imagined that such a measure as that now under consideration would have been introduced before the Commission had come to a decision on that part of the subject? Prior to the Commission coming to any conclusion on that point, the House was asked to appoint a vice chancellor, with £4,000 a year, in the interim, for doing nothing. Mr. Napier also mentioned that the Bill had never been shown to him, as, being a Commissioner, it certainly ought to have been. One of his right hon. Friend's own witnesses, a Queen's Counsel, was examined as to taking the accounts, and he stated that the practice to be adopted ought to be similar to that in the Landed Estates Court, which had worked admirably well. He therefore called upon the Attorney General for Ireland to recast his Bill, because the chief clerk was not wanted in Ireland. The Commissioners, no doubt, found the chief clerk system existing in England; but side by side with the Court of Chancery in Ireland was the Court which he had the honour to reconstruct, and in which the Judge who sold the estates disposed of the accounts and settled the question of the money. If the Bill were withdrawn for the purpose of being re-considered during the recess, he would recommend the right hon. and learned Gentleman to strike out every clause relating to the chief clerk, and enact that the Judge should do the whole business himself. It was a proper subject of inquiry—and if the Secretary to the Treasury did his duty, he would look into the matter and consider whether the Landed Estates Court might not give one of its Judges, with the staff, so as to save £6,000 a year, and at the same time accomplish the chief object in view. The right hon. and learned Gentleman declared that the whole profession as well as the public had called out for this Bill. He maintained, on the contrary, that the profession were generally opposed to it. It was stated in the draught of the measure that the chief clerks were all to be solicitors. He had the highest respect for the body of solicitors, but he doubted the wisdom of converting them suddenly into Judges. He was told that the certificates of the chief clerks in England were often very long, very complicated, and frequently objected to. Mr. Rogers in his evidence said, that the taking of accounts was often the most important part of the case, that it was of the most vital importance to the parties concerned, and that in dealing with it, points of law of extreme nicety were to be decided. Mr. Rogers added that it was better that these matters should be decided by the Judge himself. He challenged his right hon. Friend to read him one passage from the evidence in which it was stated, that the taking of these accounts would be better done by the persons on whom the duty would be thrown by the Bill than by the Judges of the landed estates, or by the present masters. A vast quantity of the business of the Court required to be transacted in a cheap, easy, and expeditious manner. The right hon. Gentleman was under the impression that the business would be more cheaply done under his Bill. He had, however, asked one of the most experienced officers of the Court of Chancery to give him in writing his opinion on the subject of cost. That gentleman stated his belief that the increase of expense would be more than one-third compared with the present system. Would the right hon. Gentleman point out in favour of his Bill one single scrap of evidence on that vital question in every legal reform—the question of cost? He felt confident that the Attorney General for Ireland would be able during the recess to draw up a more compendious and cheaper Bill for carrying out many of the suggestions of the Commission. Considering the character and size of the Bill, the differences of opinion which prevailed, and the late period of the Session, he appealed to his right hon. Friend to postpone the measure for another year. It was the opinion of the Master of the Rolls that more than one-half of the reforms in this Bill could be effected by general orders. Those orders might be drawn up in the recess, and Her Majesty's Attorney General would, no doubt, look them over. He warned every hon. Gentleman who cared a farthing for the public purse, of the increased expense which the Bill would cause. When some of the gentlemen whom it was proposed to pension off made their appearance before the Committee of 1856, it was shrewdly remarked that they seemed in very good health; and he was happy to inform the House that they were still alive and capable of work. As vacancies occurred among the Masters, he would recommend his right hon. Friend not to fill them up. Let the number fall down gradually to one, and if his right hon. Friend was determined to have a vice chancellor, let him take one of the Judges of the Landed Estates Court—that admirable Englishman, Mr. Hargrave, or one of the others—with all his staff. There were many other questions of great importance which he should like to have discussed had there been time; but, in conclusion, he would suggest that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mallow should withdraw his Amendment, and he would then move his, which was more direct—that the Speaker leave the Chair that day three months.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he had no objection to adopt the suggestion, and would therefore withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Whiteside.)

—instead thereof.

MR. BUTT said, he hoped that the House would clearly understand before it went to a division, that the short question before it was, Whether reforms which had been carried on in England, and found to work most successfully, should be extended to Ireland?

MR. GEORGE said, that a Bill of 192 clauses, which proposed to alter the whole practice and procedure of the Irish Court of Chancery, required a great deal more discussion than it had received before it could possibly become law. The Masters in Chancery in Ireland fulfilled the very duties which they proposed to create expensive officials to discharge. The Commission of 1861 was composed of men of the highest character, but the Committee of 1856 was equally composed of men of the highest character. It was strange, however, that no reference was made in the Commission of 1861 to the labours of the former Committee. Not a single English witness was examined by that Commission. The labours of the masters had been most valuable. Out of 14,400 cases decided by them in ten years there were only 137 appeals, and only forty reversals. He believed that the change proposed was unpalatable to the whole Bar of Ireland.

Original Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. VANCE said, that after the very narrow majority by which the Government had defeated the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin, he thought they should not press the Motion for going into Committee. He understood that eleven of the clauses had been agreed to when only four or five Members were present, and he therefore thought that they ought to re-commit the Bill de novo. As, however, he did not think they ought to be called upon to go into the clauses at that late hour (twenty minutes to twelve o'clock), he would move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Vance.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was true the majority just obtained by the Government was a small one, but it was larger than that by which the Motion for the Chairman to leave the Chair was carried on Tuesday last. If the House would allow the Speaker to leave the Chair, and would go into Committee on the Bill, the Government would not proceed with any of the clauses that night; and before the Committee on the Bill was resumed, his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland would consider what course he should take with reference to the measure, regard being had to the circumstances which had already taken place, and to the period of the Session at which the House had arrived.

MR. HUNT observed that, as it was obvious the Government could not carry the Bill during the Session, it would be more graceful of them to at once withdraw it.

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, the subject was one of great importance with reference to proceedings in Ireland, and he did not think that he ought to be called on to come to a decision off-hand as to the fate of the Bill, but he would give the matter his best consideration.

Question put.

Original Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. COLLINS moved the adjournment of the House. After the division which had taken place he thought they ought not to proceed that night with the discussion of the Bill. Perhaps the noble Lord would tell them whether he knew of a single instance of the attempt to set aside the decision of the House that the Chairman should leave the Chair.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Collins.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, no doubt the hon. Member was a great authority in these matters, but he ought to have recollected that the Speaker, in answer to a question addressed to him, had declared that the course which had been pursued was strictly in accordance with the rules of the House.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he did not understand that such a proposition had been laid down. On the contrary, he thought the rule was that a vote that the Chairman do leave the Chair was regarded by any Gentleman charged with a Bill as a strong hint not to introduce it again. It seemed, however, that with right hon. Gentlemen opposite the strongest argument in favour of the Bill was that the opinion of the House had been pronounced against it.

COLONEL W. STUART said, that though the Speaker had decided that they might, according to the letter of the law, go on with the Bill, yet they all felt that it was sharp practice to go on with it with only a majority of two in favour of such a proceeding, while a majority of one the other day had stopped the progress of the Bill. The other day the Chief Secretary for Ireland was present, but to-night he was not in his place.

MR. ESMONDE said, he would remind the House that the Bill had only been put into its present position by the operation of the letter of the law, for if there had been any Parliamentary equity, the vote of the hon. Baronet (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) would have been recorded according to his intention.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he did not understand the feverish anxiety of the Government to pass the Bill, and to cover their reputation at the expense of the sister country. He hoped they would yield to the undoubted feeling of the House, and take further discussion at a reasonable hour.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that his right hon. and learned Friend did not ask them to make further progress with the Bill that night, but he did wish that effect should be given to the Vote which had been twice taken. He protested against the assumption that a majority of the House in Committee was to prevent the House receiving the Bill. If that were so, measures of great importance might be frustrated by a casual Treasury Bench majority.

Question put.

Original Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. LYGON said, he wished it to be understood that he felt himself incompetent to discuss the Bill upon its merits, but having watched its varying fortunes, fluctuating as they did every five minutes, he would ask the Government if they intended to persevere with it. If it were right to reinstate it upon a technical objection, it was perfectly right also for that side of the House to urge technical objections against its progress. He begged leave, therefore, to move the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that there was one great difference between the objects of the two sides of the House. The Government desired to see the Bill discussed on its own merits, and to have it passed if the House concurred in the opinion they held of the advantages which they believed it would confer, while the other side of the House desired to prevent its passing under any circumstances—not to defeat it by argument, but to prevent its progress by offering every obstruction in their power. As, however, the point was not in reality one of great importance, the Government would consent to the adjournment of the debate.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

LANDS (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 100.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time,"
—(Mr. Frederick Peel.)

MR. GEORGE said, that this Bill was a most unjust one, though in a very small compass. There was in existence no Act of Parliament which gave rent charges for drainage a priority over other incumbrances as regards unimproved land; and as he objected to such a priority, he begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. George.)

MR. BAGWELL said, he did not see what was the use of the Bill, for until the Government undertook the arterial drainage of the country nothing could be done.

MR. PEEL said, that the Act of the last Session was coming into rather extensive operation, and it would be very undesirable if, after all the trouble that had been taken to form district boards, they should find that the security which they could give the Government for loans was not such as it could accept. The Bill was mainly intended to repair that defect; and he could not see, therefore, what exception could be taken to it. The mortgages of persons who had a priority of claim before the Government would really be improved by the draining of the land; but if there were any case of hardship, he should be glad to insert words in Committee to meet it.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that there was something in the objection to the Bill, but as the right hon. Gentleman proposed to improve it in Committee, he would not oppose the second reading.

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, the land drained would often not be worth the expense of the drainage, and therefore the cost was proposed to be secured on the adjoining land not required to be drained; otherwise the money would not be advanced at all for the draining. He would suggest that the second reading should be agreed to, modifications being made in Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

House adjourned at One o'clock,

THE CONFERENCE.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I have to lay upon your table, by command of Her Majesty, the Protocols of the proceedings of the Conference upon the affairs of Denmark and Germany, which has just been brought to a close. In laying these papers upon your Lordships' table I propose to follow the course which was pursued by the Earl of Liverpool in 1823, and I am confident that in following that example I am pursuing a course which is perfectly fair to this House and to the country. In that case the English Government had been carrying on negotiations first at Verona, the Conference at which place was attended by the Duke of Wellington, and afterwards at Paris, on the subject of the invasion of Spain. The Government of that day declared that the invasion of Spain was contrary to all the principles of English policy, and that it was an interference which was entirely opposed not only to the sentiments of this country, but to the settlement of Europe which had been come to some years before.

They, therefore, protested against it, while at the same time they thought it advisable to preserve peace and declare a neutrality between this country and France. Upon the present occasion I have to discuss a question which is of a very intricate nature, and which for a long time was considered to be one that might go on for many many years without raising any exciting interest, and which was almost too complicated and too wearisome to engage much of the public attention. For the last year, however, that question has been in a very different condition.

My Lords, before I refer to the proceedings of the Conference it is necessary to take some notice of those engagements which have been the origin of these disputes, though they were intended to put an end to all differences between Germany and Denmark. Your Lordships are well aware that in these times it is necessary that a treaty should not only have the signatures of envoys and the ratifications of Sovereigns, but that in its working it should be made to accord with the sentiments and wishes of the people who are to be governed under it. A remarkable instance of difference in this respect has occurred with regard to the operation of the Treaty of Vienna of 1815 with respect to Lombardy, and the operation of the same treaty with reference to Genoa. Your Lordships are aware that for many years great discontent prevailed in Lombardy, which was only removed by the separation of that province from Austria. On the other hand, in Genoa, by the wise and patriotic conduct of the Kings of Sardinia, all the objections, all the repugnance, which originally existed in Genoa against their rule have been finally overcome and removed, and Piedmont and Genoa are now in perfect harmony. Unfortunately the Treaty of 1852 in regard to Denmark, and the engagements which were entered into in the previous year, 1851, with respect to an arrangement between Germany and Denmark, were in their operation exceedingly unsatisfactory. It was declared, and has lately been repeated in the Conference, that an attempt was made by the King of Denmark, contrary to the engagements of 1852, and contrary also to all sound policy, to make the people of Schleswig change their national character, and so to interfere with their churches and schools as to keep up a perpetual irritation, thereby violating the spirit of the engagements between Denmark and Germany. How far those accusations were true as regards the exact letter of those engagements I will not stop to inquire; but it is quite certain that there was prevailing in Schleswig great dissatisfaction at the manner in which the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein were governed, and that great complaints were made on that account against the Danish Government. It was for a long time the public opinion in this country that Germany had no reason to complain of Denmark as violating her engagements; but I am afraid that, by an impolitic course at all events, the Danish Government produced the feeling in Germany that the subjects of the King of Denmark of the German race were not fairly governed. Oppression there could not be said to be. The Government was a free Government, and, generally speaking, the people living under it were prosperous; but there was in the two Duchies much of that irritation which prevailed in Belgium previous to its separation from Holland. On the other side, it must be said that the German Governments, instead of asking that which might fairly have been demanded — instead of asking that the engagements should be kept in their spirit, and that arrangements should be made (which could easily have been devised) to give satisfaction to the people of the Duchies—made proposals inconsistent, as it appeared to me, with their engagements, pushing beyond their legitimate sense the words of those engagements, and suggested arrangements which, if they had come into operation, would have made Denmark completely subject to Germany. Among other proposals—indeed, one of the chief — was that the 900,000 people who were said to be of German race, and even the 50,000 of the Duchy of Lauenburg, should have a representation equal to that of the 1,600,000 inhabitants of the kingdom of Denmark. This was evidently so unfair and calculated to be so destructive of Danish independence and nationality, that Denmark refused to accede to it. It was, in fact, such a proposal as if Scotland and Ireland were to demand each an equal number of representatives with England in the Imperial Parliament. The consequence of these disputes, unfortunately, was, that instead of the treaty taking root and fully satisfying the wishes of the people of the Duchies, there was a kind of never-ceasing irritation which burst forth as occasion arose; and, as Germany was greatly more powerful than Denmark, it was but too probable that the latter would have to suffer one day on account of the complaints which were made by the Germans. It was impossible not to foresee that such would probably be the consequence, and that the irritation to which I allude would not go on for ever without exciting great dissension and perhaps war. Therefore in September, 1862, when I was at Brussels in attendance on Her Majesty, I explained to Sir Augustus Paget, who was shortly about to return to Denmark, a plan of pacification which it appeared to me would keep the Duchies under the rule of the King of Denmark; which would be satisfactory to themselves; which would give them a Minister for Schleswig and a body of representatives; a Minister for Holstein and a body of representatives, and would thus put an end for ever to the demand that at Copenhagen there should sit a majority of representatives for the Duchies. The Danish Government—as I think unfortunately—utterly rejected that proposal, and matters went on in the same unsatisfactory state. The diplomatic correspondence which the British Government proposed should take place did take place between Germany and Denmark, but it only produced increased bitterness and further irritation. At length in October, 1863, the German Governments at Frankfort declared that they must proceed to Federal Execution. If, my Lords, that Federal Execution had been founded on any infringement of the rights of Holstein—if it had been founded solely upon the misgovernment of Holstein, or on any violation of the rights of the Confederation, no Power would, I think, be entitled to complain of it. It embraced, however, a point which had nothing to do with Federal rule—the point of an equal representation at Copenhagen. It was, then, that the British Government declared that that could not be a matter of indifference, because it aimed, in fact, not only at the integrity, but at the independence, of Denmark. Things remained in this state until the death of the King of Denmark, which produced an entire alteration in the state of affairs. It was then contended on behalf of Germany that, after looking closely into some very intricate questions of representative and hereditary succession, they were bound to declare that the King of Denmark had no right to succeed to the Duchies, but that by the law of the Confederation the Prince of Augustenburg was the proper heir to the throne. This declaration, adopted almost throughout the whole of Germany, was received with applause not only by the popular, but by the Conservative party; by persons of the highest rank as well as by the general mass of the community; and every Government that pretended to adhere to the Treaty of 1852 was denounced as recreant to the cause of Germany. In this state of affairs the Governments of Austria and of Prussia took a somewhat singular and not very defensible course. In the beginning they declared in the Diet that, having a majority in favour of this declaration, they would proceed to Federal Execution—thereby, to all appearance, making the present King of Denmark responsible for that which was done by the late King, and to all intents and purposes, as it would seem, acknowledging his sovereignty over Holstein. They, at the same time, however, somewhat privately and without the general knowledge of Europe, declared that they reserved the question of the succession. It did not appear to the Danish Government, nor did it appear to Her Majesty's Government, that Federal Execution could be resisted without increasing the complications of the position. But, immediately after that took place, Austria and Prussia declared that they must occupy the Duchy of Schleswig in order to obtain the fulfilment of the engagements of 1852. Your Lordships are well aware that shortly before that declaration the Government of Denmark announced that they were ready to repeal the Constitution of November, 1863, which was the apparent ground of the proposed Federal Execution. Unfortunately, they had not acceded to that proposal when Lord Wodehouse went to Copenhagen, and when the concession might have been effectual. The German Governments, in their hurry to go to war, and being evidently determined on going to war—in the first place in order to gratify the German sentiment on the subject—took no heed of the proposal which was made by the British Government, and which was supported by France and Russia, that a protocol should be signed by the different Governments, binding Denmark to a repeal of the Constitution of November, and the German troops of Austria and Prussia entered Schleswig. I think it was impossible for the British Government to give any advice on this occasion. It was evidently the invasion of a territory which did not in any way belong to Germany, and a territory to which according to our view the King of Denmark had the fullest right. It was said that it was to be occupied as "a material guarantee;" but no country is, I conceive, obliged to submit to an occupation of its territory which it believes it has the power and right to resist. Your Lordships are fully aware of the events of the war which subsequently took place. It resulted, as must naturally be expected, in the defeat of the Danes and the occupation of the Duchies by an overwhelming force of Austrian and Prussian troops. That being so, and the Austrian Government having always said that they were ready to agree to a Conference, and Prussia assenting to that proposal, Her Majesty's Government proposed that a Conference should be held. The Danish Government refused an armistice, but declared themselves ready to enter into a Conference. The Austrian and Prussian as well as the French Government expressed a wish that it should be attended by a Plenipotentiary of the German Confederation, and after some delay one was sent. The Conference was not assembled regularly until the 25th of April, and some delay then took place with a view of obtaining, if not an armistice, at least a suspension of arms for a considerable period. The Danish Government would not agree to an armistice; but a suspension of arms they did agree to, which was only to last for the period of four weeks. My Lords, it was difficult in matters so intricate, and on which passions had been so much roused, to come to any agreement beforehand; but Her Majesty's Government thought it their duty to proceed to the Conference, in the interests of peace, even without any such agreement. On the 12th of May, after the suspension of arms had been agreed to, I asked the Austrian and Prussian Governments to declare what it was they asked for in the interests of peace. Now, be it observed that although the Prussian Government, and the Austrian Government likewise, had continually declared that they had certain engagements to insist upon which had not been fulfilled, they never yet had agreed to specify what these engagements were which would secure peace, and by which they would be bound. When Lord Wodehouse went to Berlin on his way to Copenhagen he endeavoured, according to the instructions he had received, to obtain some explanations from the Prussian Government on this point. The Prussian Government replied, "Let the Danish Government first repeal the Constitution of November, and we will afterwards see what arrangement they propose to put in the place of that; we will judge of that proposal and give our opinion upon it." Nothing, I must say, could be less explicit, or a less justification for the course they were pursuing; because at the same time they were ready to carry on war to the extremity, to use all their means to invade Schleswig with all the dreadful consequences, without making a distinct declaration of their terms. When, however, the Powers were assembled in Conference, and the Plenipotentiaries of Austria and Prussia were obliged to meet the Plenipotentiaries of Russia, France, and Sweden as well as of Great Britain, they found themselves compelled to make some statement of the terms which they would require. Be it observed that throughout—even up to the 31st of January—the two German Governments had declared that they adhered to the Treaty of London, and the execution and occupation were proofs that they still adhered to the integrity of the Danish Monarchy. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, had no reason to suppose that their proposal would be of a different character. We were told, however, upon authority so high as to be almost official, that there was an intention on their part to propose what was called a personal union; and that personal union was to be of this nature—that the whole Duchy of Holstein and the whole Duchy of Schleswig were to be united; they were to have a separate army and navy from those of Denmark; that they were to have complete self-government; and, in fact, that the King of Denmark was to have scarcely any influence over the two Duchies. In one of the last meetings of the Conference M. Quaade, one of the Danish Plenipotentiaries, declared that if that personal union had ever been proposed, it would have been impossible for the Danes to agree to it. Indeed, it was likely that, with the disposition which prevailed in Germany, German agitation would have produced a declaration of separation on the part of the two Duchies, and German arms would then have supported the Duchies in that wish for separation. Therefore, though nominally maintaining the integrity of Denmark, and though nominally adhering to the Treaty of 1852, the proposition of a personal union would have been, in fact, a separation of the Duchies from Denmark under a very thin transparent disguise. That, however, was not the exact proposal of the German Plenipotentiaries. In the meeting of the 17th of May the first Plenipotentiary of Prussia declared that—

“What the Austrian and Prussian Governments wished was a pacification which would assure to the Duchies absolute guarantees against the recurrence of any foreign oppression, and which, by thus excluding for the future any subject of dispute, of revolution, and of war, would guarantee to Germany that security in the North which she requires in order not to fall again periodically into the state of affairs which brought on the present war. These guarantees can only be found in the complete political independence of the Duchies and their close connection by means of common institutions.”—Protocol, No. 5.

Now, this declaration on the part of the two Powers is not a little remarkable. Your Lordships will observe the phrase, “guarantee against foreign oppression.” That oppression meant the oppression of the Government of the King of Denmark. But he was Duke of Holstein de facto and de jure, his title had never been disputed, and his government, if it was oppressive, could only be a domestic oppression. The two Powers, therefore, of Austria and Prussia, to whom Europe had a right to look for respect for the faith of treaties, declared at once that the government of the Danish Duchies was of the nature of a foreign oppression. At the same time, the declaration “for a security against any subject of dispute, war, and revolution,” was so ambiguous that none of the Plenipotentiaries could tell what its meaning was. The Russian Plenipotentiary said he was quite at a loss to know what it meant. The French Plenipotentiary followed in the same tone; and for a long period we were quite unable in the Conference to say what was really the intention of the two Powers. We asked who was to be the Sovereign of these two Duchies which were to be thus governed? The answer of the German Plenipotentiary was that that was a question to be decided by the Diet. Austria and Prussia, but more especially Austria, had declared hitherto that the Treaty of 1852 was a question that was decided—that the late King of Denmark had a right to settle the succession, and that his decision in favour of Prince Christian, the present King of Denmark, would be respected by those Powers. It was equally notorious that the Diet, if it met, would, by a considerable majority, declare against the title of the King of Denmark. Count Bernstorff did not deny that, and the Plenipotentiary of the German Diet declared at once that the majority of the Diet would never consent to an arrangement which, even in an eventual or conditional form, would sanction a union between the Duchies and Denmark. Thus, while the two Powers, Austria and Prussia, were in appearance consenting to the maintenance of the Treaty of 1852, telling us that the Diet might ultimately decide in favour of the King of Denmark as the legitimate heir, the German Plenipotentiary, who, in fact, had greater Power than either the Plenipotentiaries of Austria or Prussia, because they never at any time ventured to oppose that which he declared to be the will of Germany, declared that Germany would never consent to the restoration of the Duchies to Denmark.

My Lords, at the next meeting of the Conference, which took place on the 17th of May, there was a more positive declaration. Austria and Prussia then declared that they could no longer acknowledge the King of Denmark as Sovereign of the Duchies; that the whole of the two Duchies ought to be separated from Denmark and placed under the sovereignty of the Prince of Augustenburg; that he should be declared the rightful possessor of the throne of these Duchies, and that that was a declaration which would be hailed throughout Germany and would meet the wishes of the German people. Before this declaration was made, in preparation for such an event, the Plenipotentiaries of the neutral Powers had met to consider the situation. The Government of France had had some communication with the Government of this country. The French Government had declared that they thought the personal union could not be the foundation of a lasting peace, and that the only mode of obtaining such a peace would be to separate the Danish nationalities in the Duchies from the German nationalities. After these communications I consulted the other neutral Plenipotentiaries, who met at my private house for the purpose of considering the matter. We came to the conclusion that it was useless to propose that the two Duchies should remain under the King of Denmark. It was quite obvious that unless we had been prepared—I should say all of us prepared—to carry on a great war for the purpose, after the hostilities which had taken place, after the declarations which had been made by the German Powers, if anything like a personal union had been established there would at once have been a declaration on the part of the Duchies and on the part of the German Confederation, supported by Austria and Prussia, that the Prince of Augustenburg was entitled to hold the Duchies, and that he was the rightful Sovereign; and that if the Danish troops entered to dispute possession of the Duchies, they would be opposed by Austria, Prussia, and the whole Confederation. We had therefore to consider what we could propose which would be most favourable to Denmark under the circumstances which I have stated to your Lordships. Of course we could only propose something of a diplomatic nature, which we thought likely to be accepted. We accordingly prepared a proposition, which I as President of the Conference was to submit, and which I was assured would be supported by the Plenipotentiaries of France and Sweden, and as far as possible by the Russian Plenipotentiary, though he had not then received definite instructions. What we proposed was that the King of Denmark should yield to Germany the Duchy of Holstein and the Southern portion of the Duchy of Schleswig—that the boundary should be drawn as far as the Schlei, and should go along by the Dannenwerke; that there should be no menacing fortresses on the boundary; that the German Powers should not interfere any further or any more in the internal affairs of Denmark; and that a general guarantee should be given by the European Powers for the rest of the Danish possessions. With regard to this proposal, the Danish Plenipotentiaries made a declaration which I think did that Government the highest honour. They declared that the King of Denmark had accepted the Crown of that country according to the Treaty of 1852, thinking that his doing so would tend to the peace of Europe and to preserve the balance of power; but, as the surrender of a great part of his territory was now demanded, he was ready to make that concession, provided that entire independence and self-government were left to the remainder of his dominions. The King of Denmark declared he was ready to accept the line of the Schlei as proposed; and without defining it he declared it was necessary there should be a military and commercial line drawn for the sake of the independence of Denmark; and he declared moreover that there should be an European guarantee for the possession of the remainder of his territory. The German

Governments, while they accepted the proposal for the partition of Schleswig—while they no longer demanded the whole of that Duchy—declared that, according to their views, the line of demarcation must go much further north. They said that the line must be from Apenrade to Tondern; and that they could not assent to the line proposed on the part of the neutral Plenipotentiaries. They declared, at the same time, they were perfectly ready to agree that, with regard to the territory to be left to the King of Denmark, there should be no right of interference and no interference whatever with the independence of Denmark. I confess, my Lords, it appeared to me that the proposal we submitted was the best arrangement that could be made. It was not to be expected that those Duchies could be retained under the nominal sovereignty of the King of Denmark without giving rise to fresh disputes and fresh complications. It was obvious, also, that if that sovereignty had been admitted to be vested in the King of Denmark, there would be constant interference on the part of Germany, and that interference, which has gone on for the last twelve years, giving rise to continual disputes, would cause constant contentions in future. It would be far better that Denmark should have a restricted territory, with the understanding that in her restricted territory her own Government should have absolute control, than that she should be subject to perpetual interference and control on the part of the German Powers. The French Government more especially took that view. The French Plenipotentiary declared it had always been the opinion of his Government that the division of the nationalities was the cause of all the complications which had taken place, and that nothing could be settled satisfactorily until there had been a separation of the nationalities; but he declared in the name of the Emperor, at the same time, that it was necessary great forbearance should be shown towards Denmark as the weaker Power; that the part evidently and confessedly German should be given to the Duchy of Holstein; and with regard to the mixed districts, as well as the Danish part, they should be left to Denmark as a means of preserving her independence, and giving her a mercantile and military line. Unhappily, my Lords, upon this occasion, as throughout those questions, the German Powers, instead of taking those views of generosity and forbearance which were urged so well by the Emperor of the French, determined to insist on what, undoubtedly, was their right if the right of conquest was the only one to be considered. They stood on the right of conquest; they stood on the victory they had gained on the disputed territory; but with respect to generosity and forbearance towards a Power so disproportionate to themselves—with respect to a due consideration for the peace of Europe—with respect to the absence of a desire to rush again into war in order to retain that which by right of conquest they might say they had acquired—I should not be treating your Lordships with sincerity if I said there was any such forbearance, any such generosity, any such regard for the peace of Europe, manifested on the part of Austria, Prussia, and the German Confederation. I must say likewise, my Lords, that there was an assumption which was not justifiable on the part of Denmark, and in reference to which my noble Friend Lord Clarendon made a clear and pointed statement at a subsequent meeting of the Conference. The Danish Government considered that the line which we had proposed in the name of the neutral Powers, and after consulting the neutral Powers, as a basis of pacification, was an English proposal—an English proposal by which England was bound to abide, and which she was bound to maintain at all hazards. Nothing of the kind, however, was ever stated by the British Plenipotentiaries; nothing of the kind had Denmark a right to expect. I did inform the Danish Plenipotentiary, when there was a question of continuing the Armistice, that I should not propose nor support any division but the line of the Schlei without the consent of Denmark; but I never gave him to understand that England would support that line otherwise than by urging its adoption in conjunction with the other neutral Powers at the meetings of the Conference. The last suspension of arms was only for a fortnight, and it remained for us to consider what should be done—the two parties being obstinately bent on the maintenance of their different rights—the Germans insisting on the line from Apenrade to Tondern, and the Danes insisting first upon a line extending more to the south than that which the British Plenipotentiary had proposed in the Conference, and afterwards agreeing to that line, but declaring that they would make no further concessions. What could be done to bring about an amicable understanding? In this situation of affairs, knowing that Denmark would not consent to any other line—indeed, not knowing whether the German Powers would concede any other line—the Prussian Plenipotentiary said that he was ready to recommend to his Government a line which should proceed from the north of Flensburg to Tondern, but that he was not authorized to propose that line in the name of his Government. The Austrian Plenipotentiary did not accede at first, but afterwards said that he would recommend it to the consideration of his Government. But the Danes at once refused it, and the proposal fell to the ground. It then remained to be considered whether, without proposing any other line, some means could not be found by which peace might still be preserved. We considered that question very anxiously, and it came to be a subject of reflection whether we could not, even at the last moment, propose something which might bring the two Powers to an agreement. It was obvious that many and great difficulties had to be removed. The King of Denmark was ready to yield a part of his dominions of which he had been deprived by war. The German Plenipotentiaries were ready to say that a part of the Duchy of Schleswig should remain under the rule of the King of Denmark. Both Powers were ready to accept the proposal that there should be no interference in future in the internal government of Denmark; and all the Powers, I think, would have been ready, if there had been an agreement on other points, to give a guarantee—a European guarantee—to Denmark, which would have left that Power, indeed, without any sovereignty over the German population, but still possessed of an independent territory, and still possessed of a free and happy Government, not subject to foreign interference. Well, the question was, whether, there remaining only this line of frontier to be decided, it could not be arranged in some way to which both Powers would agree. We thought it possible that in that case the spirit of the Protocol of Paris might be adopted. The Protocol of Paris said, that when serious differences arose between any Powers, and there was danger of those differences being carried to hostilities, the good offices of a friendly Power might be resorted to, and it appeared to us that if this principle could be brought into action, the continuance of the war might be obviated. It was stated at the same time by the French Plenipotentiary at Paris, and by others, that where the honour or the essential interests of a country were mainly concerned, it could not be expected that such differences should be submitted to a friendly Power. But, in our opinion, this was not such a case. It appeared to us that sooner than rush into war—sooner, above all, than expose Denmark again to such an unequal contest—it was possible to propose the good offices of a friendly Power, with this condition—that both Powers should submit to the decision respecting the line of frontier offered by the arbitrator to whom the matter might be referred. In fact it was to be an arbitration rather than good offices. Now, I cannot but believe that any impartial arbitrator would have fixed upon a line far more favourable to Denmark than that which the German Powers had proposed. A Power which was impartial and without passion would probably have given, not the line as far as the north of Flensburg, but a line to the south of Flensburg, whereby that important town might have been preserved to Denmark, and that Power would have had a port in the Northern Sea by which her independence might have been maintained. It was, however, entirely a question for the two Powers to accept or to refuse that arbitration. I may say further that my noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) and myself, who were the British Plenipotentiaries at the Conference, thought that after the fairness and the impartiality which the Emperor of the French had shown throughout this question, his friendliness, and at the same time his wish for the maintenance of peace, the two Powers might well have accepted his good offices. The opinion was, however, expressed by one of the Plenipotentiaries—an opinion afterwards confirmed by an official declaration—that no Power represented at the Conference, and therefore committed to a certain degree as to the questions before the Conference, could properly be accepted as the arbitrating Power. It then appeared to us, and we so informed the Plenipotentiaries, that in our opinion the King of the Belgians, whose impartiality is likewise well known, and whose long experience of European affairs makes him most desirous to preserve the peace of Europe, might perform these functions to the satisfaction of the Powers concerned. But the question of who should be the arbitrator never arose. Austria and Prussia said that they could accept the good offices of a friendly Power in accordance with the Treaty of Paris, but that they could not accept the decision of that friendly Power as final; and in the mean time they asked for a long armistice. Now, my Lords, it appeared to us that if that proposal were accepted, then, after a period of two or three months of armistice, during which the naval operations of Denmark would be suspended, a decision would have been announced which, if it in any way displeased the German Powers—if it did not go to the full extent of all their demands—would have been refused by them. The Plenipotentiary of the German Confederation completely confirmed our view of this question by declaring that in his opinion this territory of Schleswig belonged altogether to the Prince of Augustenburg, or rather belonged to the competency of the German Confederation; that they could therefore accept no arbitration, and could not be bound by anything that was decided. They evidently meant that every foot of territory in Schleswig might, if they chose it, be demanded at the end of the good offices by the German Confederation. Thus, according to what I am sorry to say has been the usual manner of the German Powers, their refusal was not a direct and straightforward one. It is somewhat like their declaration at the beginning, that they went into Holstein for the purpose of Federal Execution, that they went into Schleswig for the purpose of material occupation, and that they wished the question of the sovereignty of Holstein and Schleswig to be decided in the German Confederation, knowing perfectly well how that decision would be made; and then, lastly, they wished to have the appearance of accepting the good offices of an arbitrator without really intending to accept them. The Danish Plenipotentiaries, most unfortunately in my opinion—most imprudently in my opinion—gave a decided refusal to the proposal. Of course, it was for them to judge as to the security of their own country and the prospects of war; but I certainly regret deeply that they should have rejected the arbitration. The proposal that I made certainly did not exactly agree with the line of the Schlei, but it was a proposal which we, the British Plenipotentiaries, thought was for the benefit of Denmark, and was most likely to obtain for the Danes a peace which would have been satisfactory to them. And now, my Lords, all other means having failed, one other proposal was made on the part of France by the French Plenipotentiary, who was directed to make this proposal—that, leaving the Danish part of Schleswig to the Danes, and the German part to the Germans, the line to be drawn in the disputed district should be decided by a vote of the population, to be taken in some fair manner, the details of which might be considered afterwards. [The Earl of CLARENDON: The votes were to be taken in each commune.] Yes, and these votes were to decide the line to be drawn and the district which was to belong to Germany and to Denmark respectively.

THE EARL OF DERBY: May I ask the noble Earl if that decision was to be taken during the occupation of the province by the German troops?

EARL RUSSELL: No; the French proposition was clearly that the Prussian troops should evacuate the district before the vote was taken by means of Commissioners. At the same time, it was the opinion of the Danes—and I believe that opinion to have been well founded—that although the people of Schleswig generally were perfectly satisfied to remain united to Denmark, such had been the effects of the occupation, such had been the agitation on the part of Germany, the political societies in Germany having sent persons to agitate all over the country, that the decisions would through that influence have become corrupted, and the plan of the Emperor, which otherwise might have been successful, would have been rendered unjust. The proposition was accordingly refused. My Lords, it was with great regret that the Plenipotentiaries of the neutral Powers received this decision.

My Lords, I must say that my noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) and I have received from France and from the other neutral Powers the firmest support during the continuance of the Conference. We held frequent private meetings with the neutral Powers, in which we discussed the proposals to be made. There was nothing exhibited in those meetings but the most earnest desire to provide for the safety and independence of Denmark, and I must say that the utmost harmony prevailed on all sides; and the French, Russian, and Swedish Plenipotentiaries alike did all in their power to contribute towards the success of the proposals we made. We shall, therefore, leave the Conference with a strong sense of our obligations for the support which we received from them.

After this decision there remained nothing more for the Conference but to accept the declaration which was made at the last meeting—and which has been repeated to me to-day by the Austrian Ambassador—it is simply that the two Powers, Austria and Prussia, have no intention of carrying on hostilities with the view of obtaining possession of any territory beyond the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, and that they have no intention of making any conquest of any portion of the Danish territory on the continent or of the Danish islands. That declaration is purely voluntary, and is not in any way extorted as to the manner in which these Powers propose to act. At the same time it comes rather late—though they make the declaration I suppose they cannot intend us to accept it—and we certainly cannot accept it as one upon which we can implicitly rely. After that which has happened with respect to the Treaty of 1852, and after that which has happened with respect to the treatment of the Danes after the pledges given, but more as I am afraid owing to German popular opinion, which Austria is desirous to conciliate, which Prussia is desirous to conciliate, which the German Confederation, above all, is anxious to conciliate, I am sorry to say that, greatly as I have respected Austria, greatly as I have respected Prussia, we can no longer rely, as we have done, upon their declarations.

Well, my Lords, but the question comes as to what, at the end of the Conference, is our position, and what will be our course? And without intending, or being able to pledge, the Government in case of contingencies which have not arisen, I think it is due to Parliament and to the country—especially at this period of the Session—to declare what is the view which the Government take of the position, the duty, the interests, and the future policy of England. My Lords, with regard to our honour, I conceive that in honour we are in no way engaged to take part in the present war. Although it has been stated to the contrary on the part of Denmark more than once, there has been at no time any pledge given on the part of this country or Her Majesty's Government promising material assistance to Denmark in this contest. Three times Her Majesty's Government during the period I have held the seals of the Foreign Office have endeavoured to induce Denmark to accept propositions which we regarded as favourable to her interests. In 1862 I made propoaitions to her, but those propositions were rejected. When Lord Wodehouse went to Denmark, he and the Russian Plenipotentiary proposed that Denmark should repeal the Constitution which she had concurred in but a few days before; but she would not at that time receive the proposal. We believe that, if she had consented to the arbitration which we proposed in the Conference, the result would have been as favourable to her as, under the circumstances in which she was placed, she could have expected. My Lords, I do not blame Denmark for the course she has thought fit to pursue. She has a right—I should be sorry to reproach her in any way in her present state of weakness—she has an undoubted right to refuse our propositions, but we on our side have also a right to take into consideration the duty, honour, and interests of this country, and not to make that duty, that honour, and those interests subordinate to the interests of any foreign Power whatever. My Lords, our honour not being engaged, we have to consider what we might be led to do for the interests of other Powers, and for the sake of that balance of power which in 1852 was declared by general consent to be connected with the integrity of Denmark. My Lords, I cannot but believe that the Treaty of 1852 having been entered into, if there had been at an early period—say in December or January last—if France, Great Britain, and Russia, supported by the assistance which they might have counted upon receiving from Sweden, had declared for the maintenance of the Treaty of 1852—the succession of the King of Denmark might have been established without difficulty, and might have been peaceably maintained, and that the King and his Government would have remedied all the grievances of which his German subjects complained. I believe the King of Denmark would have found it to his advantage to grant to his German subjects that freedom, those privileges, and that self-government in their internal and domestic matters which they had demanded, and that they would thus have become quite contented as subjects to the King of Denmark. That desirable result, however, could not be brought about. In reference to the Treaty of 1852, I have to repeat what I stated on a previous occasion—that it was not a treaty of guarantee, that the Governments of France and Russia were competent to acknowledge the treaty, but that they had not pledged themselves to maintain the connection of Schleswig and Denmark, that not being a question of the general balance of power in Europe. Well, the French Government have frequently declared and have repeated to us only within the last twenty-four hours, that the Emperor does not consider it essential to the interest of France to support the line of the Schlei. He declares he does not think that France would be inclined to go to war for such an object. He urges that a war with Germany would be a most serious thing to France, that our armies would not be marshalled to oppose the invasion of Denmark, and that such a war would consequently be attended with great cost and great risk. I think that if that war were successful, France would expect some compensation on account of her participation, and that compensation could hardly be granted without exciting general jealousy among the other nations of Europe, and thus disturbing the balance of power which now exists. I cannot deny that if the Emperor of the French puts forward these considerations—if he declares that for these reasons, though he would give us moral support, he would afford us no material assistance in such war—I must say I think he is justified in that refusal, and in adopting such a line of conduct. I cannot but admit that if a great war with Germany arose, whatever might be the issue, it might reproduce those great contests which took place in 1814, and which led to such unsatisfactory results. The Emperor of the French is a Sovereign singularly wise and sagacious, and I will say valuing, as he has proved that he values, the peace of Europe, I am not in a position to find fault, nor can Her Majesty's Government find any fault with the decision to which the Emperor has come. But the Emperor of the French having thus declared his policy, and the Emperor of Russia having constantly refused to join with us in affording material support to Denmark, our position, of course, must be greatly influenced by those decisions. In the first place, is it the duty of this country—if we are to undertake the preservation of the balance of power in Europe as it was recognized in 1852—is it a duty incumbent on us alone? The French Government sees very clearly the dangers to which France might be exposed by interfering, but it says at the same time that it would be an easy operation for England; that England, with her naval power, might add most materially to the strength of Denmark and assist in bringing the war to a conclusion. My Lords, I must say there are many considerations which induce me to arrive at a different conclusion. I cannot but think, in the first place, that we should suffer perhaps considerably if our commercial marine was exposed to depredations such as might take place in the event of our being at war with Germany. That is one consideration which ought not to be overlooked. But there are other considerations of still greater moment. One is—Would our interference bring this war to a conclusion? Without giving military aid could you recover Schleswig and Holstein, and even Jutland from the Austrian and Prussian forces? Well, my Lords, we have for a long time in our conduct of foreign affairs shown great forbearance and patience. I think we were right in being forbearing, and think we were justified in being patient. But if our honour or our interests or the great interests of Europe should call upon us to interfere, I think such interference ought to be clearly effectual, as nothing would more tend to diminish the influence of this country than a course of action which would show that while we were predominant at sea, and that no Austrian or Prussian ships of war could venture to leave port, yet at the same time our interference could not insure, as we hoped it would, the safety of Denmark, nor lead to a speedy termination of the war. But, my Lords, the whole position and influence of this country with regard to foreign countries ought to be fully considered by Parliament and by the country; for we have great interests with multiplied complications arising from various connections and various treaties with every part of the world. It is no longer a question with reference to the balance of power in Europe. There are other parts of the world in which our interests may be as deeply involved, and which we may some day or other find it necessary to maintain the honour and interests of this country. The civil war now raging in America, ending how it may—whether by the establishment of an independent republic in the South, or whether it ends most unexpectedly, as it would be to me, I confess, by restoring the Union—still the United States of America or the Northern States, or whatever they may be called, will then be in a totally different position to that which they were in a few years ago. A great army will then be maintained by the United States. A formidable navy will also be kept up. Our relations with that Power are liable at any moment to interruption. I hope and trust that our friendly relations may continue uninterrupted; still, those relations must be considered and kept in view as well as our interest in the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe. My Lords, let us look at other parts of the world. Look at the great commerce which has grown up in China, where it is necessary for us always to maintain a considerable naval force to protect it. Look at our immense possessions in India and see how necessary it is that they should be considered at all times. In any question, therefore, of peace or war—while it is very probable that this country with allies could carry on a war successfully—yet when it comes to be a war to be carried on by England alone, there are other contingencies to be looked at, and the position of this country is to be considered with reference not to Europe alone, but with reference to our interests in every quarter of the world. My Lords, these are considerations to be borne in mind with respect to this question of Denmark. It may be said that other combinations might be made—that although we could not ourselves attack the German Powers with any great amount of success, yet there are vulnerable points upon which they, and especially Austria, may be open to attack; that those doctrines and theories which Austria and Prussia have put forward, with regard to foreign nationalities, may be retorted upon them, and especially upon Austria with effect—they may be applied to other parts of Europe than Schleswig and Holstein; that the German nationality is not the only nationality in Europe; that the Italian nationality has as much right to be considered as the Germans; and that if we were to enter upon a course of supporting nationalities, we should be perfectly justified by the doctrines and conduct of Austria. This, no doubt, would be sufficient if the object were merely to show to Austria and Prussia that they are vulnerable on their own ground. But, my Lords, I think it is the duty of England to show a greater attachment to peace than Austria and Prussia have shown, and not, if possible, to light a flame which might extend to every part of Europe, but rather to endeavour to confine the war within the narrowest limits possible. Therefore, my Lords, with regard to this question, it is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that we should maintain the position which we have occupied, and that we should be neutral in this war. I do not mean to say that contingencies may not arise in which our position might become different, and in which our conduct might be altered. It may be said, "Will you allow these German Powers to act as they please? If, contrary to their professions and promises, they should decide upon sending a combined Austrian and Prussian force to Copenhagen with the declared object of making Denmark assent to terms which would be destructive of her independence—will you then remain entirely indifferent to such proceedings?" My Lords, I can only say in answer to such a question, that every Government in this country must retain to itself a certain liberty—as long as it possesses the confidence of Parliament—a certain liberty of decision upon such points. All I can now say is, that if the Government should think it necessary to come to any fresh decision—if the war should assume a new character—if circumstances should arise which might require us to make another decision, it would be our duty, if Parliament were sitting, immediately to apply to Parliament upon the subject; and if Parliament should not be sitting, then at once to call Parliament together in order that it may judge the conduct which Her Majesty's Government should pursue.

In the meantime, my Lords, I have given you an outline of the course of these negotiations. I have given you an account of the efforts we have made for peace, which, like the efforts made in 1823 by the Governments of Lord Liverpool and Mr. Canning, have been unfortunately unsuccessful. I say that our policy at the present time is to maintain peace. If there is any party in Parliament—if there is any individual in Parliament—who thinks as Lord Grey thought in 1823 that we ought to go to war, it will be competent for them to ask Her Majesty to interfere materially in the contest. If they think that in any respect we have failed in our duty, it is competent for them to take any line of conduct they may think proper. But, for ourselves, I say with confidence that we have maintained the honour of the country, that we have done everything in our power to preserve the peace of Europe, and that, those efforts having failed, we can rest satisfied that nothing has been wanting on our parts which was needed by the honour or the interests of this country—that nothing has

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, the almost unprecedented attendance of your Lordships on the present occasion clearly indicates that you are keenly sensible of the gravity of the statement which has just been made by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. My Lords, it is impossible to overrate the magnitude and importance of the interests involved in that statement. Interests of such vast importance are hanging in the balance at the present moment—the peace of Europe—I do not say the present, but the ultimate peace of Europe—is placed in fearful peril—anything which may pass in this House may have for good or evil so serious an effect—that if I have risen to follow the noble Earl in the statement he has made, it is not for the purpose of going through the various topics on which he has touched, or commenting on the different parts of his speech, but for the purpose of expressing my earnest and anxious hope that your Lordships may see, not only the propriety, but the absolute necessity, of abstaining on the present occasion from all partial and, consequently, unsatisfactory expressions of opinion. The noble Earl has entered at very great length upon three distinct topics, which he has treated, no doubt, with very great ability and with great clearness. He has entered on a justification of the course which Her Majesty's Government has pursued in relation to the Conference; he has given a statement of what has passed in the Conference; and somewhat vaguely, certainly, but with sufficient explicitness for the present, he has stated what is the policy which Her Majesty's Government are prepared to pursue in the position in which we are now placed. My Lords, of the first part of the noble Earl's statement I have no complaint whatever to make. It was perfectly natural that in laying on the table, by Her Majesty's command, the Protocols of the late Conference held in London on the affairs of Denmark he should have brought under your Lordships' notice the circumstances in which the Conference originated, the position of Europe at the time it assembled, and the result at which it has arrived. And I do not complain of the general statement which the noble Earl has made, although, undoubtedly, there were some very material facts he altogether omitted, and some circumstances to which, perhaps, he gave a colouring in which I can hardly concur. But, as I said, I am not going to enter upon a discussion of the statement of the noble Earl as to the position in which we are placed; still less of the more important, yet totally different, circumstances to which that position may be owing—to what conduct on our part or on the part of foreign Powers, to what policy pursued by the Government, it may have been owing that we were placed, at the period of the assembling of the Conference, in the unfortunate position in which we now stand. My Lords, that may—probably will—form the subject of further discussion, if not in this, at all events in the other House of Parliament—and probably in both Houses of Parliament. But on the present occasion, certainly, your Lordships would not deem it expedient to enter on all the various phases which the Schleswig Holstein question—simple enough in its commencement and complicated enough in its progress—has presented since 1852, or from an earlier period. But I must say the noble Earl has taken a course this evening not in accordance with ordinary practice, and perhaps not with the ordinary procedure of the House, when he proceeded to enter on a discussion and give his own account of various proceedings which passed in the Conference, reading from a number of papers which he laid on the table, but of which, not being yet in the hands of any one of your Lordships, we are bound to accept his statement without discussion. But I confess, for my part, my Lords, while I think the most important part of the question which Parliament has to consider is the course of policy which Her Majesty's Government have pursued—whether they have taken the course best suited to effect their own objects—namely, to obtain a satisfactory arrangement between the different belligerents and, at the same time, maintain inviolate the honour of England—while I say they are of the utmost importance, I think all these questions must have much greater reference to an earlier period—namely, to that before the commencement of the Conference, and to things which then took place of which we know nothing. Because, with all respect to the opinions of the noble Lords and the right hon. Gentlemen who have stated that as soon as you could get the Plenipotentiaries assembled around the table there would be no sort of difficulty in coming to a satisfactory conclusion—without in the slightest degree disparaging the ability which the two noble Earls engaged in the Conference have conducted its affairs—I think I may venture to say that, beyond the limited circle of the Members of Her Majesty's Government, there were few, if any, persons who could anticipate from the circumstances under which we entered upon that Conference any other than a signal and lamentable failure—although many there were, of course, who wished for a very different conclusion. Why, what were the circumstances? There were at that moment eight parties who had been called to the Conference, which was composed of thirteen gentlemen representing eight different interests. Of these eight different interests four were belligerents—three engaged on one side and one on the other; and there were also the four neutral Powers—England, France, Russia, and Sweden. With regard to the belligerents, what was the position of affairs on which they were invited to enter? It is true that with regard to the three belligerents on the one side, their aims, their notions, their ulterior objects appear to have had considerable diversity; but all three were from various motives unitedly bent on destroying the Kingdom of Denmark—all three were not quite so equally united, perhaps, in the ulterior objects of their spoliation, or their portion in the division of the spoil; but all were combined in the determination to carry war and spoliation into the territories of Denmark. It was at this moment when, flushed with the triumph of their arms, and with the glory of their successes, which had been gained by their enormous numerical superiority, and the superiority of their ammunitions and artillery—it was at this moment when flashed with the prospect of success, proud of the military glory they thought they had obtained, and seeing before them nothing but a feeble and more than half-vanquished enemy, they consented most reluctantly to be arrested in their career, and they hardly yielded—from no unappreciable motive—to the pressing solicitations of England—not of the four neutral Powers, but of England alone—to a temporary suspension of hostilities, and would not even consent to an armistice between the belligerents. On the other hand, there was the Kingdom of Denmark—a small, gallant nation, who were fighting with the utmost determination and the courage of despair in behalf of all they held dear and sacred—in behalf of their homes, in behalf of their constitution, in behalf of their King, in behalf of their families—fighting against overwhelming odds—and seeing themselves deserted by the whole European community, from which, whether with or without reason, they had undoubtedly entertained strong hope that they would receive support—finding themselves pressed to the very uttermost, I say, in their position the courage despair would give might naturally induce them to refuse another suspension of hostilities which they might naturally consider unfavourable to themselves at the moment, and say, “Rather than enter into such discreditable terms, let us die in the face of day and in the face of Europe, which, to its shame, has permitted us to do so.” Now, such were the circumstances under which the Plenipotentiaries came to the Conference—unwillingly, all of them—with different views—three on one side and one on the other—the subject of oppression and violence—on the part of the small and weak Kingdom of Denmark. On the other hand, the four neutral Powers entered into discussions without the slightest previous agreement between themselves as to what they should ask, what they should recommend, and what they should insist upon. Eight different interests were collected together in Conference in the middle of the excitement of a war, without any previous basis of negotiations being agreed upon, without anything being settled, except that which the noble Lord at the head of the Government is reported to have described when he said that the basis of the Conference was the restoration of the peace of Europe. On that basis, and on that basis only, you entered into the Conference, without previous communications, without previous agreement, without previous understandings—and you profess to be astonished that the Conference led to nothing but failure! It is a matter of comparative indifference—the two noble Lords charged with the interests of England may have conducted the affairs of the Conference with more or less ability, with perfect sincerity, no doubt, to maintain the peace of Europe—I have not the slightest doubt on that subject—Prussia and Austria may have been more or less unreasonable, Denmark may have been more or less firm in her decisions, the Diet may have been more or less exacting—the belligerents may have placed themselves more or less in opposition to all their previous declarations before entering into the Conference—all these questions are matters of comparative indifference, because, in my judgment, from the time the Conference began to sit it was a doomed Conference from which it was impossible to hope any practical result could arise. Therefore the absence of these Protocols do not place your Lordships under the slightest disadvantage in judging of the position and policy of Her Majesty's Government in bringing this matter to the position in which it now stands; still less will the imperfect statement which has been made, and in the absence of any important information as to the facts of the case, enable you to express any opinion whatever upon that most important decision which it appears Her Majesty's Government have arrived at—namely, to acquiesce in the present state of affairs, and remain in the position of passive neutrality. At the commencement of the Session I ventured to express, in terms as strong as it was possible for man to use, the infinite danger which I saw in even the possibility of a war with Germany—with that Power with which we had been so many years associated—which has been, and, unless modern aggressive ideas have too far prevailed, is the great conservative central counterpoise to the ambitions of the East and of the West—a Power naturally connected with us by many ties, and a war with which could not but be productive of the most lamentable consequences, not only to them but to ourselves also. But, my Lords, what I also said was this. I feared—and that is the great question that we shall have to discuss hereafter—I feared the Government had, by the course of policy they had pursued, placed us in the position in which we must be subjected either to the lamentable consequences of such a war or to the discredit in which we should be held—and in which, I fear, we are held—by the whole of Europe, not for having abstained from war now, but for having for a long period held out to the contending parties menaces on the one hand, and encouragement on the other—a course entirely inconsistent with that policy which Her Majesty's Government now profess, and properly profess—namely, an earnest desire and determination to maintain unbroken the peace of this England, so far as that can be done with honour. That is the question on which serious discussion must take place; that is the question the decision of which will solve in the mind of Parliament and the country whether Her Majesty's Government have maintained inviolate the honour of the country, or whether, on the other hand, their policy has not been such as to expose them to the charge of a feeble and vacillating opposition, yielding at every step when encroachment was threatened, always suggesting that that encroachment would be met by a firm resistance, but whenever the encroachment took place yielding and protesting only that further encroachment would not be tolerated. That is the charge against which Her Majesty's Government—not now, but hereafter—will have to defend themselves. That is the feeling which I believe is very prevalent in the minds of the people of this country. That is the feeling which has taken deeply hold of the Parliament and of the country. And if I wanted any confirmation of its application to the course which Her Majesty's Government have pursued, and to the course which they may be expected to pursue, I should find it in the concluding portion of the noble Earl's speech, in which, after elaborately discussing all the disadvantages and all the dangers of going to war—all the injury we should sustain, all the loss to our commerce, and all the serious consequences, not merely present consequences, but even the fear of consequences as possibly leading to a rupture with the States of America at some future time—the noble Earl, to my astonishment, concluded by saying—not “Nothing on earth shall induce us to go to war,” not “We hold ourselves altogether aloof from this question,” not “Our interests are so vitally concerned, our commerce is so extensive, our relations so various, our treaties so numerous that we are determined, coûte qui coûte, to keep the peace, and we appeal to the country to give us credit for having maintained the country in a state of peace, prosperity, and wealth”—but “We reserve to ourselves, if further steps should be taken, a perfect right to alter our course,” to sacrifice all these considerations upon which he laid so much stress, to enter upon that war which he so justly and so seriously deprecated, and altogether to depart from the principles which the Government have laid down, and upon which they have acted for the last two years. Why, my Lords, that is exactly what the noble Earl and the Government have been saying all along. First of all, Germany is to take into its serious consideration the dangers which must ensue, and must incur all the responsibility of Federal Execution in Holstein. Then Denmark is recommended, “As this is only Federal Execution in Holstein, we advise you to submit to it; but if the Germans go beyond Holstein, if they once cross the Eider, if they enter Schleswig, if the Diet is permitted to turn Federal Execution into an international question, then the case will be altogether altered; then Her Majesty's Government may see the necessity of departing from the course which they have hitherto laid down in certain contingencies, and afford you material assistance.” Schleswig was occupied; but we were assured it was taken only as a material guarantee for the fulfilment of certain other engagements. “Oh, if it is only occupied as a material guarantee for the fulfilment of other engagements, that alters the question; but if you mean a permanent occupation of Schleswig, that is a thing the Government cannot for a moment tolerate.” Schleswig was occupied. “Then, at all events, you cannot pass into Jutland; you must not think of Jutland.” Well, into Jutland walked the troops—for strategic reasons, as the noble Earl has observed, which he does not presume to justify; but the entrance of troops into Jutland was not a contingency which, although it was seriously threatened before, induced Her Majesty's Government to depart from their pacific intentions. Now, I ask the noble Earl, what is the contingency which will? And I think that Parliament is bound to have some assurance on that point. “We will not go to war,” says the noble Earl, “but we may see reasons to alter our course.” I think the noble Earl went so far as to say that if Copenhagen should be blockaded and bombarded, then possibly—possibly Her Majesty's Government might think that the contingency had arisen which should induce them to depart from their prudent resolutions. But, short of the capture of Copenhagen, we want to know, and the country wants to know, how far the noble Earl will be—I was going to say—driven before he departs from the prudent resolutions—and I do not deny that they are prudent if they can be maintained with honour—which he has laid down. I hope I may be pardoned for having gone as far as I have in pointing out the questions to which I think it will be the duty of Her Majesty's Government hereafter to give a distinct answer, and upon which I hope that Parliament will insist upon having, not only a distinct answer from the Government, but a distinct decision upon the judgment of Parliament. For the present, however, I confess that I should be very sorry that this discussion should be prolonged. Perhaps, as I certainly have gone beyond my own intentions, I may have gone beyond what was desirable in the temptation of following the noble Earl for the purpose of pointing out, not that which we are to discuss now, but that which we shall have to discuss, and must discuss hereafter. For the present, I repeat, I earnestly hope that, neither with regard to the past, nor with regard to the more important future, will your Lordships be led, upon the partial statement which has been laid before you, to enter upon an impromptu discussion, still less to pledge yourselves individually or collectively to any line of conduct, either of condemnation of the Government for the past or of assent to or dissent from the course which they have propounded for the future.

EARL GRANVILLE: I think that the House ought to come to a clear understanding as to the course which it intends to pursue; whether it is to be that which was recommended by the noble Earl at the commencement and again at the end of his speech, and cheered by the House, of abstaining from any discussion upon this great subject until your Lordships have in your hands the papers which are necessary to explain it, or that which the noble Earl has adopted in the course of his observations, touching upon all those points which appear to him most vulnerable, and making statements and using arguments with reference to the Conference which appeared to me to be applicable to any Conference whatever which might be assembled for the purpose of establishing peace between a stronger and a weaker nation, the stronger nation being flushed with victory and the weaker one not assured of the support of the neutral Powers. That may go on. On both sides of the House declamatory arguments may be used without reference to facts, which may create popular prejudice, but cannot affect the reason of the country; and we may all imitate the example of the noble Earl who has put into the mouth of my noble Friend statements which neither in his speech today nor in the course of the negotiations has he ever made. To such alternatives as the noble Earl has put to us, asking us either to declare to Europe and the world that, whatever our honour and interests may require, we will pronounce ourselves determined never to go to war at all, or that we should—as has often been demanded by Members of the Opposition—pledge ourselves as to the future, our answer must be that we should not be justified, as representing Her Majesty's Government in this House, in exactly defining every possible contingency without knowing what course events may take in the future. I cannot help thinking that the feeling of the House is in favour of the course recommended at the beginning and end of the noble Earl's speech, and that your Lordships do not desire to discuss this question at present. All that I can say on behalf of Her Majesty's Government is, that if the House is of a different opinion we are ready at once to take the whole discussion, but we beg that it may not be of a piecemeal description.

LORD BROUGHAM was understood to express his regret that the belligerent Powers had refused to submit the questions in dispute between them to arbitration, and especially to condemn the roundabout manner in which the German Powers had intimated their refusal.

CIVIL BILL COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.—
(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that the Bill did not embody all the improvements which were desirable. The Bill proposed a very important alteration in law; but it was very imperfect.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that although undoubtedly the Bill was very imperfect, still he thought it was a measure which deserved the support of the House. He would further express a hope that the Government would go still further in the path of law reform, and that they would not abandon the Irish Court of Chancery Bill, which had been introduced into the other House.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE was understood to remark upon the power given to the sheriffs to appoint the bailiffs who were to execute the civil bill decrees.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that he wished to make two or three observations before the Bill was read a second time. He quite agreed with all that had fallen from the noble Earl who spoke last; and from his own experience as a magistrate, he found that a great part of the crime to be dealt with in his part of Ireland consisted of assaults committed in resisting the execution of civil bill decrees. It was, therefore, very important that the bailiffs who executed these decrees should be under proper control. By the 37th clause of this Bill it was provided, that the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench should have the power to make and alter rules with regard to appeal cases stated for their decision. Now, his (the Earl of Belmore's) attention had been called to the fact that appeals were made to the other Superior Courts of common law as well as to the Queen's Bench. He would, therefore, give notice of an Amendment in Committee to provide for those cases. By the 6th clause of the Bill the Chairman was to have power to fine the bailiffs for neglect or misconduct. These bailiffs were generally taken from a very low class, and not possessed of any property, so that the power to fine them would not be productive of much effect, and he thought that the Chairman should have some further control over them. These were minor points, and he would give due notice of Amendments to be proposed in Committee.

After a few words, in reply, from The Lord CHANCELLOR, Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before

QUESTION.

MR. WARNER said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House in the present Session a Bill to carry into effect the recommendations of the Select Committee on Poor Relief?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in reply, that the recommendations of that Committee had reference to matters of various kinds, and not immediately connected with each other, and it would probably be convenient to introduce several Bills to carry them into effect. He had directed the Report to be sent to the different Boards of Guardians, with the view of ascertaining if there were any practical difficulties in the way of adopting some of the Amendments proposed. He should shortly be in a position to inform the House what course the Government would adopt with regard to the Report. At all events, if he could not introduce any Bill this Session he should be prepared at the earliest moment of the next Session to introduce a Bill on the subject.

STATE OF PARK LANE.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Bath, as a Member of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether that Board has come to any decision as to the opening of Hamilton Place to public traffic, with the view of relieving the crowded state of Park Lane?

MR. TITE said, in reply, that the Metropolitan Board had had under its consideration the crowded state of Park Lane, and had come to the conclusion that the best, if not the only, mode of relieving it would be by the opening of Hamilton Place. They had communicated this opinion to the First Commissioner of Works. There were difficulties in the way on account of the opposition of the tenants of some houses, who were Crown Lessees; but since all that was required in order to effect the improvement was a slip of land only 100 yards in length, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would lend his aid in carrying out this great metropolitan improvement.

EGHAM RAILWAY ACCIDENT. QUESTION.

SIR RICHARD BULKELEY said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been drawn to the evidence given at the inquest on the sufferers by the late Railway accident at Egham by Mr. Robert Archibald Scott, Traffic Manager of the South Western Railway, in which he says—

“ Ordinarily, I should think there would not be the slightest danger in starting them (the trains) at an interval of five minutes, allowing the first train to make a first stoppage at a distance of eight miles. It is quite an ordinary working of the trains. Some lines allow only three minutes.”

Also to the evidence of Thomas Gibbard, office porter at Egham, whose duty was to note the arrival and departure of the trains, and who states—

“ That the Royal train (containing their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales) passed through Egham in the morning at 12.51, and that Lee passed through at 12.47.”

Whether the President of the Board of Trade would inform the House on what lines trains are started at intervals of three minutes only; whether starting trains on the same line at intervals of three minutes is done with the knowledge and sanction of the Board of Trade; and whether he considers the safety of their Royal Highnesses was sufficiently protected in allowing a heavy passenger train to precede them by four minutes only?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the Board of Trade had no legal authority to interfere with the traffic regulations of railways, and therefore any regulations in force could not be said to have had the sanction of the Board of Trade. Nevertheless, the Inspectors of Railways gave information to the Board of Trade from time to time on which the Board thought it right to send letters to the Railway Companies calling attention to any representations that might be made in regard to regulations of a dangerous character. With regard to the third Question, he had asked Colonel Yolland what was the state of the case, and he told him that it was quite exceptional to allow so small an interval as three minutes between trains, the ordinary practice being to allow at least five minutes between the starting of trains. Colonel Yolland added, however, that the question of time was not material if proper precautions were taken. With regard to the last Question, as to the safety of the Royal train in going from London to Ascot, he had to state that circumstances under which that train was proceeding were quite different from the circumstances under which the trains were proceeding in the case where the collision took place. The other trains were stopping at the various stations, but the Royal train and that which preceded it were going through to Ascot without stopping. As a matter of fact, he believed there was only an interval of four minutes between these two trains.

CHURCH LIVINGS (IRELAND). QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reference to Return No. 267 of this Session, “ Established Church (Ireland), number of livings in each diocese in Ireland, value of living, &c.” Whether the net annual value of each living which is given was exclusive of the glebe house and land, and whether in the possession of the incumbent or let to tenants?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, in reply, that in the Return in question the net annual value of the livings was exclusive of the value of the glebe house, but was inclusive of the net value of the glebe land, whether in the occupation of the incumbent or not.

GUNS FOR THE NAVY. QUESTION.

MR. CORRY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, with reference to his recent statement that a large order had been given for the manufacture of 10½-inch smooth-bore Guns for the Navy, throwing a spherical shot of 150lb., Whether the Admiralty will consider the advisableness of having those Guns rifled on the shunt principle, so as to admit of their being fired either with round shot or with elongated projectiles?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that the right hon. Gentleman was under some misconception. What he had stated on a recent occasion was, that a large order had been given for 110-pounder rifled guns for the navy, and that likewise a certain number of 10-inch guns were in preparation, some of which were already on board the Royal Sovereign. It was the intention of the Admiralty to rifle those guns, and the mode of rifling them was under the consideration of the Ordnance Committee.

EXPIRING LAWS BILL.

Select Committee appointed,

"To inquire what temporary Laws of a public and general nature are now in force, and what Laws of the like nature have expired since the last Report on the subject; and also what Laws of the like nature are about to expire at particular periods, or in consequence of any contingent public events, and to report the same, with their Observations thereupon, to the House :"—Mr. PEEL, Mr. MASSEY, Sir STAFFORD NOTHCOTE, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Mr. ADDERLEY, Mr. COWPER, Sir WILLIAM JOLLIFFE, Colonel FRENCH, Mr. BARING, Mr. BRAND, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Lord JOHN MANNERS :—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.—(Mr. Peel.)

DENMARK AND GERMANY. THE CONFERENCE.

Copy presented, of Protocols of Conferences held in London relative to the Affairs of Denmark [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I rise to move that these papers be printed. In doing so, I am quite aware that there never was an occasion, probably, on which a Minister of the Crown had to make a statement—short and simple as I intend to make it—to this House of Parliament, and through it to the public, on which the feelings of the country, the sympathies of the country, the aspirations, and, I may say, the anxieties of the country, were more deeply engaged than in the question on which it will be my duty for a short time to detain the House. Sir, the sympathies which the British nation feel in the cause of Denmark will do honour to them in all time wherever they are recorded. ["Hear, hear!"] I stand here, however, not to excite those sympathies or to profit by them. I stand here upon this occasion simply to communicate to the House in a short abstract the substance of those proceedings of the Conference, which are recorded in detail in the papers now laid upon the table—and although on Friday I doubted whether the record of the proceedings of Saturday would be sufficiently ready to be laid before Parliament in conjunction with the papers relating to the preceding events, I am now able to say that they will be delivered to Members to-morrow morning, together with the papers relating to the other proceedings of the Conference. Among them will be found an abstract of the proceedings of the Conference drawn up by one of the Plenipotentiaries, which will greatly assist hon. Members in making themselves masters of the more detailed negotiations recorded in the Protocols.

But, to explain more fully, and to make this House understand completely the nature of the questions which were treated of in the Conference, it will be necessary for me to go a little further back, and to offer some remarks as to the points upon which the subsequent controversies and the proceedings of the Conference turned. The House, however, is sufficiently familiar with those transactions and their origin to make it unnecessary for me to do more than give a general outline of the affairs to which I refer. The Treaty of 1852 was negotiated by myself and by Lord Granville, who succeeded me, and was concluded by Lord Malmesbury, who succeeded him; so that, as far as the policy of that treaty is concerned, all parties in this country are equally bound by it. It was founded upon European considerations. It did not originate simply with England—it was an arrangement dictated by European interests. ["Hear, hear!"] The state of the matter was this:—The law of succession in Denmark admitted females to the throne; the law of succession in Holstein confined the right to males. If, therefore, any case should arise in which there was a default of issue male in Denmark, it was clear that, by the operation of those conflicting laws, Denmark and Holstein would be separated. But the late King of Denmark, being advanced in years, had no offspring; the Prince who would have been his immediate successor, had he outlived the King, had no offspring either; and therefore the Powers of Europe felt it necessary to take into consideration the threatened splitting up of the Danish monarchy, which they held to be inconsistent with the general interests and the balance of power in Europe. For this purpose it was necessary to assimilate the law of succession in the two parts of the Danish monarchy. To alter the law in Holstein was impossible, because it was the law of the Germanic Confederation of which Holstein is a member. The other expedient therefore was adopted, and it was agreed that the lex regia of Denmark should be altered so that males only should succeed to the Crown. It was also agreed that the King of Denmark should have the power of naming his successor to the throne of Denmark, and that arrangements should be made by which that successor should inherit the Duchy of Holstein. These arrangements were the object of the Treaty of 1852. The King of Denmark chose as his successor Prince Christian of Glücksburg; and there being a question of the right of the Duke of Augustenburg to Holstein, that right was commuted by a pecuniary indemnity. The Duke of Augustenburg having been in rebellion against his Sovereign on a former occasion, his estates were confiscated; but the value of those estates was now given to him on condition that he renounced for himself, his heirs, and successors all claim to the Duchy of Holstein. The Treaty of 1852 provided, therefore, as far as the foresight of the parties to it could go, for the maintenance of the integrity of the Danish monarchy as then constituted, by the possession on the part of Denmark of the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein. That treaty was greatly approved by all the parties who were concerned in it. A question, however, arose whether, as Holstein was affected by the treaty, it should be submitted for the concurrence of the Diet at Frankfort? The asking for that concurrence was at first objected to by all the Powers concerned—by the German Powers, by Russia, by Sweden, and by Denmark. My noble Friend Lord Granville, when he held the seals of the Foreign Office, did, however, propose that the treaty before it was concluded should be submitted to the Frankfort Diet. But that proposal met with no assent. On the contrary, as will be seen by the papers now in the hands of Members, some parties expressed their dismay at such a proposal—dismay arising from the delay which they held would be the consequence of such an application—and a different course was adopted, namely, that, whereas the Diet consists only of representatives of the different German Powers, application should be made to those Powers themselves to accede to the treaty which had been concluded. The application was made, and several States acceded; but it is right to say that some other States, including Bavaria and Baden, declined to assent to the treaty in consequence of feelings connected with German opinion as bearing upon the Duchies of Holstein and Schleswig. Well, Sir, that treaty was preceded by certain diplomatic communications between Germany and Denmark, which led to various arrangements; but the material arrangement was this—that whereas, on the one hand, the great object of Denmark had always been to incorporate Schleswig with Denmark, and whereas, on the other hand, the great object for which the Germans had always contended was the political and administrative union of Schleswig with Holstein, both should give up their respective pretensions—that the King of Denmark, on the one hand, should engage not to incorporate Schleswig with Denmark, and the Germans, on the other, agree no longer to require the political union of Schleswig with Holstein. So stood matters at the conclusion of the treaty, in which, if all the parties had been equally animated by a spirit of conciliation—and I must say of justice—it would have been better for them, and I am not aware that any serious complications would have arisen. But during the ten years which elapsed between the conclusion of that treaty and the death of the late King of Denmark a series of mutual complaints arose between the parties. The Germans contended, and I am afraid not without some reason, that the Danish Government had not acted fairly in its treatment of the German population of Schleswig—that in their extreme desire to extend Danish influence and rule they had in some degree interfered with the free exercise by the German population of that duchy of those privileges which belonged to them as the subjects of a free State. It is also to be borne in mind that in March of last year a Patent—that is to say, a Constitution—for Holstein was proclaimed by the late King of Denmark, which the German Confederation stated to be in its details at variance with the general laws of the Confederation. Moreover, in November a Constitution was passed by the Parliament at Copenhagen for Denmark and Schleswig which the Germans contended was at variance with the engagements given by Denmark in 1851-1852 not to incorporate Schleswig with Denmark. It was contended that an arrangement for united representation and the united action of deputies at Copenhagen was virtually an incorporation pro tanto of Schleswig with Denmark. The late King of Denmark died while these questions were still under discussion between Germany and Denmark. The Patent of March for Holstein in the meantime remained in force; and the present King, from considerations connected with internal matters, found it necessary upon his recent accession to the throne to give his sanction to that Constitution of November, which up to that period had wanted the Royal Assent, and was not complete until the Royal Assent had been given. Germany remonstrated against all those arrangements. In October the Frankfort Diet had passed a Resolution that Federal troops should enter Holstein for the purpose of compelling the late King of Denmark, as Duke of Holstein, to revoke the Patent of March.

I will deal with the political question first. Matters stood in the position which I have described towards the conclusion of the year. Her Majesty's Government, thinking and believing that there were grounds for the German objections to that Patent, urged the Danish Government to revoke it, and by so doing to place themselves in the right in regard to that question. The Danish Government did so. ["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] But the Diet changed its ground, and, instead of contenting itself, as it had done up to the death of the late King, with disputing the right of the Duke of Holstein to give a Constitution which they maintained was at variance with the Federal law, they took up another ground, and contended that the question had fairly arisen who should be Duke of Holstein; they denied that the King of Denmark had succeeded legally to the Duchy of Holstein; and a proposal was made in the Diet to occupy Holstein by Federal troops until that question should be decided by the Diet. In my opinion the Diet had and has no right to consider and decide that question. There is nothing, in my opinion, either in the Treaty of 1815 constituting the Diet and giving to it birth and origin, or in the final Act of 1820 completing the Diet arrangements, which entitles the Diet to determine who should succeed in any State within the Confederation; and I am not aware that when an Emperor of Austria resigned, and was succeeded by a member of his family, the Diet claimed any right to interfere in that matter. But Austria and Prussia moved in the Diet, not that the Federal troops should not enter Holstein, but that the entrance of these troops should be what is called an "execution" and not an "occupation." By the term "execution" is meant an act of the Diet, in accordance with the Powers of the Diet and German law, to compel any Sovereign of territory belonging to the Confederation to adapt his legislation to the laws of the Confederation, if those laws should have been broken. Austria and Prussia carried their proposal, and the Diet resolved, not that the entrance of the troops should bear the character of an occupation to hold the Duchy of Holstein until the rightful heir should be determined, but that the entrance of the troops should be an act of execution, to compel the existing Duke to alter the Patent and revoke it as not being in accordance with German law. The entrance, therefore, of the Federal troops into Holstein as a measure of execution was a distinct acknowledgment by the Diet at that time that the King of Denmark was Duke of Holstein, and it was to compel him to alter or revoke the Patent of March that that execution took place. It is also to be remembered that whereas it would have been perfectly legitimate for an execution to take place if the King of Denmark had persisted in refusing to revoke the Patent, yet in point of fact the Patent was revoked before the German troops entered the Duchy of Holstein; and consequently that entrance was unjust in itself, though founded on a plea which would have given a warrant to it had the plea still held good. Well, these troops having entered on the distinct understanding that they were there to compel the King of Denmark (Duke of Holstein) to revoke the Patent, those proceedings then took place which are known to everybody, and which led to the supersession of the authority of the King Duke, and to a declaration in favour of the Duke of Augustenburg.

Then came the case of the Constitution, uniting to a certain degree, as we were compelled to admit, Schleswig with Denmark, in violation of the engagements entered into by Denmark in 1852. Her Majeasty's Government felt all the evils which would arise from an occupation of the territory of Schleswig by the German troops. I should say that though the Government of Denmark had engaged, at the suggestion of England and, I believe, the other Powers, to take the earliest means constitutionally possible to revoke that Constitution, the Germans determined to enter into and take possession of Schleswig as a material guarantee for the performance of that engagement. We proposed that some diplomatic transaction—some engagement on the part of Denmark taken in the presence of the other Powers parties to the treaty—should be accepted by the Germans as a sufficient security that the engagement would be fulfilled: but that proposal was not accepted, and the German troops entered Schleswig. When the Federal troops entered Holstein, the Danish Government, partly on advice and partly from considerations of prudence, refrained from offering any resistance to the Germans, and there was no war arising on that occasion; but when the German troops entered Schleswig the feelings of the Danish nation were too strong to admit of a similar course being pursued, and resistance—an obstinate and heroic resistance—was made against the very superior numbers which the Germans brought to bear. Up to that time, all the parties who had signed the Treaty of 1852 continued to admit its validity, and to acknowledge that they were bound by its engagements, so far as related to the acknowledgment of Christian IX. as King of Denmark and to the maintenance of the integrity of Denmark, and all the territories then held by the King. Even Prussia up to that time did not refuse to admit the binding nature of the treaty; but it is only fair to say that she intimated that if resistance should arise, and if different events should take place, then it would be possible that the German Powers might have to reconsider the engagements of the treaty. Not to weary the House by a recital of military operations which are familiar to everyone, I will state that the course of war led to the occupation by the Germans of the whole of the continental part of Schleswig, and such part of Jutland as they thought fit and expedient to occupy.

In this state of things it occurred to the Powers who were parties to the treaty and not engaged in the war, that it was desirable that a Conference should assemble, composed of the Plenipotentiaries of the belligerents, and of the four neutral Powers—England, France, Russia, and Sweden—to consider the means of re-establishing peace on a solid and permanent footing. That proposal was agreed to, and on the 25th of April the Conference met. It continued its labours until last Saturday. The first proposal made in the Conference was for a suspension of hostilities, because it was felt by the neutral Powers, England, France, Russia, and Sweden, that until the fighting ceased there was no fair prospect of a satisfactory conclusion being come to. We wished that a suspension of arms should precede the Conference; but we found it impossible to obtain an assent to such an arrangement. Well, after some delay, and a good deal of discussion when the Conference had met, a suspension of hostilities was agreed upon, to take place on the 12th of May, and to last for a month. The next thing was, that the belligerent Powers were asked on what conditions they were willing to put an end to the war and come to an amicable conclusion. The Germans, of course, were the parties on whom the question was pressed. There was some delay in extracting from the German Powers what their intentions were. They first proposed—still maintaining the principle of the integrity of the Danish Monarchy as settled by the Treaty of 1852, or at least not departing from it in words, though in substance they were thought to do so—that there should be a political and legislative union between Schleswig and Holstein, and that the connection between these united Duchies with Denmark should be the link, simply, of the Crown. They coupled that, however, with another condition, namely, that the arrangement should be reserved for the approbation of the Diet; and there was some reason to suppose that under that condition it was intended to include a discretion on the part of the Diet to decide whether the united Duchies should still continue united with Denmark, or whether the claims of some other party pretending to their possession should be considered. The Danish Government would not agree to that proposal. The German Powers then made a different proposal, but one far more objectionable—namely, that Schleswig and Holstein should be separated from the Danish Crown. That, of course, the Danes would not agree to. The neutral Powers concerted among themselves, and — seeing that Schleswig and Holstein were actually in the occupation of an overpowering military force, that it did not suit the views of France or Russia to take any active steps to dislodge that force, that Denmark was unable to do so, and that, I need not say, England was not willing singly to enter into the undertaking ["Hear, hear!"] — agreed to propose to Denmark the separation of Holstein from the Danish Crown, together with such parts of Schleswig as might be agreed upon; and the line of separation settled and proposed on the part of the neutral Powers was the line running along the Schlei down to Husum on the other coast. That proposal, coupled with other conditions which I shall not trouble the House by going into, but which will be found in the Protocol, was accepted by Denmark. Denmark said that, however unwilling to make a territorial cession, she was willing to agree to the proposal ["Hear, hear!"]; that, feeling all the inconvenience of perpetual disputes between herself and Germany, she wished to be quit of all interference on the part of the Diet in her internal affairs; and, provided she had assigned to her a frontier which in a military and commercial point of view was consistent with her interests, she was willing to accept the line I have mentioned, separating Holstein and the southern part of Schleswig from the Danish territory. The German Powers refused that arrangement. [Opposition cheers.] They asserted that the line would not include a sufficient amount of the purely German population; that there would still be a large number of Germans subject to Danish rule, and that their desire was to draw such a boundary that the great bulk of the German population should be included with Holstein. In regard to Schleswig, the fact, I take it, is this—that the extreme northern part is entirely Danish; that the extreme southern part is purely German; and that between the two there is a large extent of district in which the population is mixed—mixed not only as villages, but even as streets in the villages. It is, therefore, absolutely impossible to draw any line in the centre of Schleswig which shall entirely separate the German population from the Danish. Consequently the ground taken by the Danish Government appeared to be a fair one—that, it being impossible to draw the line with regard to nationality, it should be drawn so as to give to Denmark such a frontier as was susceptible of military defence, and would insure those commercial advantages which she was naturally anxious to secure. The Danish Government, therefore, I say, accepted the line of the Schlei. ["Hear!"] The German Plenipotentiaries, on the contrary, having given up part of Schleswig, were directed to insist on the line from Apenrade on the east to Tondern on the west coast. Between these two lines lies a district of considerable extent as compared with the extent of Schleswig, but in an European point of view of no great importance. In the course of the discussions the Prussian Plenipotentiary, Count Bernstorff, on his own authority, stated that, seeing how small the difference was which prevailed between the two parties, he would undertake to recommend to his Government to depart from the northern line of Apenrade and Tondern, and to be content with a line drawn from Flensburg to the west coast. That recommendation, however, his Government rejected, and he was obliged to say that his Government and Austria stood by the northern line, originally proposed, from Apenrade to Tondern. In the meanwhile, time pressing, the Plenipotentiaries naturally wished for a prolongation of the armistice — or, rather, I should say — for there is a technical difference between the two — the suspension of hostilities, which was to expire on the 12th of June; and with great difficulty Denmark was induced to agree to an extension for another fortnight. The German Powers were willing, as might have been expected, to extend the suspension to the beginning of winter. [Opposition cheers.] Denmark, on the other hand, grudged every fortnight of the summer that was withdrawn from her naval operations. ["Hear!"] The Danes, therefore, said they would not prolong the suspension beyond the fortnight, unless in the meanwhile some agreement should have been come to, with regard to the frontier and other things, that gave an assurance that the negotiations would result in a peaceful and satisfactory arrangement. The suspension was accordingly extended for a fortnight, which ended yesterday.

In the whole course of these negotiations I may say there was perfect unanimity between the neutral Powers — [Ministerial cheers] — between England, France, Russia, and Sweden; and although my noble Friend Earl Russell was chosen as President by the Conference at the outset, and although it may therefore have fallen to him to make several of the proposals which were submitted, these proposals must all be regarded as the proposals of the neutral Powers, because they were discussed, arranged, and settled, at meetings of the neutral Powers before they were brought before the Conference. [Ministerial cheers.] That is a very important point. ["Hear, hear!"]

As there was no possibility of bringing Germany and Denmark to agree upon any middle line between the two lines which they respectively stood by—the Schlei line being demanded by Denmark, and the Apenrade line by Germany—a last attempt was made by the neutral Powers to induce the belligerents to refer the question in dispute to arbitration. The dispute, it will be observed, had really been narrowed to a comparatively small point. It was no longer whether Holstein should be governed in a particular manner; it was no longer whether or not Schleswig should be united politically and administratively with Holstein, and whether the two Duchies should be connected by the link of the Crown with Denmark. Denmark had consented to the alienation of territory, Germany had been content with that arrangement, and the only question was, whether that arrangement should be carried out by dividing Schleswig in one part or by dividing it in another. It appeared to the neutral Powers that the territory lying between the two lines proposed was not so important to either party as to justify the resumption of the war, and that it might fairly be deemed, in accordance with the recommendation of the Conference of Paris, a question for the decision of an arbiter. Accordingly my noble Friend, as the organ of the neutral Powers, proposed that arrangement to the belligerent Plenipotentiaries. Each party, naturally, took time to refer the question to their respective Governments, and on Friday their answers were to be given. The answer of the German Powers was that they looked to the words of the Conference of Paris, which recommended the "good offices" of a friendly Power, and that the Protocol having been quoted by the neutrals, they accepted the reference of the question in dispute to a friendly Power, provided they were allowed to reserve their decision as to whether they should accept or refuse the line which the friendly Power might fix upon. [Laughter, and ironical

cheers from the Opposition.] That was at variance with the proposal made ["Hear, hear!"]; because my noble Friend, as the organ of the neutral Powers, in recommending the adoption of a reference as suggested by the Conference of Paris, distinctly stated that it was with the object that a friendly Power might decide and determine the line to be drawn between the two parts of Schleswig. ["Hear, hear!"] Therefore, the answer of the German Powers would have been more frank and candid if they had simply declined the proposal, instead of accepting it with a condition which nullified it. ["Hear, hear!"] On the other hand, the Danes, who throughout the whole transactions have certainly clung more to their decision and principles than they have shown pliability in adapting themselves to the force of circumstances, declined the arbitration, and said that they had accepted the line of the Schlei, and further north they would not consent to go. [Opposition cheers.] There seemed now to be an end to all further attempts to effect an understanding; but the Ambassador of France, by order of his Government, made another and a last effort. He proposed that, whereas the Danes had agreed to give up as far as the Schlei, and the Germans not to pass northward beyond the Apenrade line, an appeal should be made to the population of the intermediate district in order to ascertain, first of all, their relative nationality, and then what their wishes were and what arrangement they would like. ["Hear!"] That proposal the British Plenipotentiaries agreed to; but it was negatived by Denmark. [Opposition cheers.] A proposal of the same sort had been made in an earlier stage of the negotiations, but had not found favour with any party, except Prussia, who was willing to try it; Austria and Russia had decided objections to it [a laugh]; and, therefore, the idea of ascertaining the views of the population in that way was not adopted at any time in the course of the proceedings. My right hon. Friend near me reminds me that a portion of the proposal was, of course, that there should be perfect freedom of choice on the part of the population, and that such freedom could not exist unless the occupying troops were withdrawn during the voting. Prussia, as I have said, would have been willing to accept, but Austria took a different view, and thus the labours of the Confer-once were brought to a close. We have endeavoured by every possible means, in conjunction with the other neutral Powers, to bring the two parties to an agreement, and we now lament, as everybody must, that war should begin again, for a matter which might so easily, we think, have been adjusted, and on a question not involving the existence of a nation or of a Government, but simply relating to the possession of a comparatively small strip of territory.

Sir, the Conference having unfortunately ended in the manner I have stated, it became the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take into serious consideration the course which it behoved them to adopt. We felt great sympathy for Denmark; we remembered that, although she had at the beginning been in the wrong, yet another Sovereign had succeeded to the throne, a different Ministry had the direction of her affairs, and that there had been manifested by acts a strong desire to set right that which had been wrong [cheers]; we believed that, from the commencement to the end of these last events, Denmark had been ill-used [cheers]; that might had overridden right [renewed cheering]; and we knew also that the sympathies of almost the whole of the British nation were on her side. [Continued cheering.] There is a natural disposition in all who have proper feelings to take part with the weak against the strong, especially if the weak are oppressed, and if the strong are acting unjustly and tyrannically. We should, therefore, for these reasons have been glad if we had found it possible to advise our Sovereign to take part with Denmark in the approaching struggle. But then, on the other hand, it was to be considered that, whatever wrongs Denmark may have sustained—and they are many—she had in the beginning been wrong herself ["Hear, hear!"]; that at the very last of the Conferences she had rejected a proposal reasonable in itself, and one which, if accepted by the two parties, would necessarily have led to a peaceful solution of the question in dispute. ["Hear!"] Her fault in that, no doubt, was equally shared by her antagonists [cheers]; but still, in considering the position which England ought to occupy, that matter could not altogether be left out of sight. We had also to consider what really was the matter in dispute for which hostilities were to be begun, and it did not appear to us to be one of very great importance. It did not involve the independence of Denmark; it went little beyond what Denmark had herself agreed to, and related simply as to whom a particular strip of territory should belong. On the other hand, as men who were considering what advice in a very important European crisis—and I do not wish to disguise its importance—should be given to their Sovereign, we could not lose sight of the magnitude of the resistance which had to be overcome, and the comparative means which England and her supposed antagonists would be able to bring to bear in the struggle. It had been ascertained early in these transactions that France—for reasons of which she was entitled to be the judge—declined to take any active measures in support of Denmark, and we knew that her resolution in that respect still continued unchanged. We had likewise ascertained that Russia, for reasons of which she also was entitled to be the judge, was not inclined to take any active measures in support of Denmark. We knew, therefore, that the whole brunt of the effort, whatever it might be, requisite for dislodging the German troops and those which might come to their assistance from the rest of Germany, from Schleswig and Holstein, would fall upon this country alone. Under the circumstances, we have not thought it consistent with our duty to advise our Sovereign to undertake such a task. We know the honourable sympathy which the people of this nation feel for the unhappy condition of Denmark; but, at the same time, we do not think it consistent with our duty to recommend Parliament and the country to make those great exertions, and to undergo those great sacrifices, which would have been the necessary consequence of entering into a conflict with the whole of Germany. I assume that, in the present state of things upon which our decision was made, the real contest lies between Germany and Denmark with respect to—I am afraid I can hardly say that part only of Schleswig which was in dispute before the Conference closed, because it is not impossible that the whole of Schleswig may be involved in the struggle. It would be more honourable on the part of the German Powers to be satisfied with that they have demanded, but we know that strength and success frequently carry men beyond the line which, on cool reflection, they might be disposed to stand upon. Still, the contest is as regards Schleswig, and not as regards the independence of Denmark, or the safety of the capital of the Danish monarchy. I do not mean to say, therefore—I think it right, indeed, to put in this reservation—that if the war should assume a different character; if the existence of Denmark as an independent Power in Europe should be at stake; if we had reason to expect to see at Copenhagen the horrors of a town taken by assault, the destruction of property, the sacrifice of the lives, not only of its defenders, but of its peaceful inhabitants, the confiscations which would ensue, the capture of the Sovereign as a prisoner of war, and other humiliations of that kind—I do not mean to say that if any of those events were likely to happen the position of this country might not be a subject for re-consideration—[Renewed cries of "Oh!" laughter, and ironical cheering from the Opposition followed by counter cheers from the Ministerial Benches—]—we might then think it our duty to adopt another course. But this I say on the part of the Government, that if any change of policy be thought advisable, such change shall be communicated to Parliament if Parliament is sitting, and in any case the earliest opportunity shall be taken of asking the judgment of Parliament upon the matter. ["Hear, hear!"]

I have now to apologize to the House for having gone so much into detail. It was not my wish to provoke discussion. My desire simply was to explain as fully as I could the state of the matter. The papers, which will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow morning, contain full accounts of all that passed in the Conference. All the events which took place before are recorded in the papers which have now for some time been before Parliament; and, therefore, every hon. Member upon looking at those two sets of documents, will be capable of forming a proper opinion of the conduct pursued by Her Majesty's Government in regard to Danish affairs. [Cheers.]

MR. DISRAELI: I quite agree with the noble Lord that it would be very inconvenient if the House on this occasion were to enter into a general discussion respecting the transactions that have taken place between Denmark and Germany, and the policy of the English Government with regard to them. One of the reasons why I now rise is to remind the House of the exact position which it occupies at this moment. As far as the negotiations of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the dispute between Denmark and Germany are concerned, the House has incurred no responsibility whatever. ["Hear, hear!"] Since the end of last Session the House has given no opinion upon the subject. ["Hear, hear!"] Considering that I have myself taken some part in bringing about the position which the House now occupies, I trust I may not be deemed presumptuous in reminding the House of it. On the first night of the Session, interpreting the feelings of Gentlemen on this side, I expressed my want of confidence in the foreign policy of the Government, and my disapprobation of the manner in which their negotiations had been carried on, especially in the North of Europe, as well as of the results which had been realized. Had the papers been presented to the House on the meeting of Parliament, according to custom, and as we now know they might have been, there would have been no difficulty before April in asking the opinion of the House upon the conduct of these negotiations; and, indeed, what has occurred in the Conference—judging from the narrative, perspicuous though not satisfactory [a laugh], which the noble Lord has given of it, and from what otherwise has reached the ears of many Gentlemen—has very little to do with the great question upon which the House ought to give its decision. I may say here, by the way, that the origin of the Conference has not been correctly described by the noble Lord. The Conference was not called at the desire of the neutral Powers, but was called by one neutral Power, and that Power was Great Britain. ["Hear, hear!"] It met without hope, and it rises without hope; it met without a basis, and therefore it leads to no result. ["Hear, hear!"] But let me remind the House that from the period when Parliament met until the meeting of the Conference the House expressed no approbation whatever of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government with respect to these transactions. On one occasion alone its opinion was asked for in the shape of a formal Motion by an hon. Gentleman opposite. On that occasion I myself interposed, and moved the Previous Question, on the ground that the circumstances which prevailed rendered it, in my judgment, not expedient for Parliament to give any opinion on the subject. And, therefore, Her Majesty's Ministers did not enter the Conference with the confidence of Parliament, but with the Previous Question. That was the basis, as far as Parliament was concerned, on which they entered into the Conference. Well, it is necessary that the House should understand clearly they are not in any way committed to any approbation of the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers in the matter. But, Sir, I think that the time has arrived when some opinion ought to be pronounced by this House. [Cheers.] Although five months have elapsed since the period at which, as it now appears, that opinion might conveniently and properly have been taken, I myself do not regret the delays that were occasioned, because they were occasioned on both sides of this House by those feelings which, I think, do honour to the House of Commons. I have always believed that one of the principal reasons why the House of Commons, as a political institution, has been so successful and so marked out in its practical character from all other popular assemblies may be found in the respect which it entertains for the prerogatives of the Crown and the functions of constitutional Ministers. Therefore, Sir, I think that the course we then pursued was a wise, a temperate, and a patriotic course. ["Hear, hear!"] At the same time, I must say it is my conviction that we should forfeit all claim to the respect of our countrymen, and not fulfil one of the most important functions of Parliament, if, in the present critical position of affairs, we hesitated to give our opinion upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers on this question. [Cheers.] And having on several occasions expressed that conviction, I must say now that it is my intention on an early—I would say even the earliest—opportunity to ask the opinion of the House on that subject. I have no doubt that I shall find no difficulty raised by the noble Lord opposite in fixing on the period which I may think most convenient to the House for that purpose. [Viscount PALMERSTON: Not a bit.] Sir, I would add no more were it not for the closing observations of the noble Lord, which, it appears to me, ought not to pass unnoticed. I must say that I heard them with astonishment. [Renewed cheers.] Are we, then, to be taught to-night by the noble Lord that it is the Islands only of Denmark that are necessary to the independence of that country? Then why is it that we have been committed to a policy which has so long and so pertinaciously declared that the possession of Holstein and Schleswig by the Crown of Denmark was necessary to the balance of power and to the maintenance of the public law of Europe. Sir, it is too much for us now to hear, under those circumstances, that war may be impending at any moment, and that the Parliament, which is soon to be prorogued, may be suddenly called together because the noble Lord and his Colleagues, who for a considerable period have been defining the grounds upon which the balance of power and the maintenance of the public law of Europe alone depend and ought to be vindicated, find at the last moment, while they recede from the scene of action, the possibility of a smaller issue which may arise, and in the interval agitate Europe and distract the public mind. ["Hear, hear!"] After the experience that we have had on this subject, I can really look on this only—and it is some consolation to adopt that view of the question—I can look on this only as a continuation of those senseless and spiritless menaces [loud cheers], which have impaired the just influence of this country in the councils of Europe, and, by impairing that influence, have diminished the most effectual means of maintaining peace. [Cheers.] I think that the noble Lord might have spared that contingent menace to the House, to the country, and to Europe. I must say myself that, judging from the past, I would prefer that the affairs of this country should be conducted on the principle of the hon. Members for Rochdale and Birmingham than on the policy which is avowed and announced at least by the noble Lord. [Cheers.] I think that in that case, as the consequences would almost be the same, our position would be more consistent; it would certainly be more profitable, and in my opinion it would really be more dignified. At least those hon. Gentlemen would threaten nobody ["Hear!"]; at least, they would not tell Denmark that if she is attacked she will not find herself alone [cheers]; at least they would not exasperate Germany by declaiming in the full Parliament of England against the "aggravated outrages" of her policy [cheers]; at least they would not lure on Denmark by delusive counsels and fallacious hopes. [Renewed cheers.] I declare that, in my opinion, the position of England would be more dignified if the policy which those hon. Members profess regulated our affairs rather than the policy by which the noble Lord seeks to guide us. Why, have we not now, for months upon months, been menacing almost every country in the world? [Laughter and cheers.] And yet, when we thought that we had at least secured the blessings of peace—when we supposed from the gloomy narrative of disappointment and discomfiture which we have received this evening, we were at least in an intelligible position, and enjoying what some may have thought to be purchased at a great cost, but which was a clear result—namely, the possession of peace, we are at the same time to have that announcement accompanied by the continuation of these unsatisfactory menaces, and told that absolutely at this moment the whole country is to be agitated by the possibility of Parliament being called together suddenly in order that the noble Lord may commence a policy of action which, if ever justified and called for, ought to have been commenced long ago. [Loud cheers.] Sir, I trust, however, that these questions will be entered into fully and completely. When I listened to the narrative with which the noble Lord favoured us to-night of these transactions—of the continued sacrifices of Denmark—of the continued approaches of the enemies of Denmark—I confess, Sir, that I was not myself much surprised—though the point naturally awakened some curiosity and interest—that the noble Lord should have entirely omitted any notice of the inducements which made Denmark submit to these sacrifices, or any mention of those menaces addressed to the aggressive Powers which were always treated with contempt. But I should certainly have liked, while his précis of the proceedings on this question was being given us by the First Minister, to have had some account of the causes of the dreary consequences which he communicated to us. ["Hear!"] Sir, we shall soon have an opportunity of entering into that matter. I accept the noble Lord's courteous promise that he will make no difficulty respecting the day on which I shall venture to ask the opinion of the House of Commons on the policy of the Government, and I shall take care that no unnecessary delay occurs before I avail myself of it. [Loud cheers.]

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. Disraeli

ANNUITY TO THE KING OF GREECE. RESOLUTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he desired to bring under the notice of the House a matter of considerable importance, bearing in mind the precedent it involved, and the effect it might have on their future proceedings. In 1832, after the British Government of that day had adopted the decisive policy of establishing the independence of Greece, they determined, in conjunction with Russia and France, to afford such material assistance to the new kingdom as might enable it to organize a regular Government. In fulfilment of that design, a Convention was entered into between those three Powers for the purpose of enabling Greece to raise a loan sufficient to meet the financial necessities of that country. By that Convention it was provided that a sum of 60,000,000*fr.*, or about £2,400,000, should be raised by way of loan in three separate instalments. The first was to be raised immediately; the other two as the circumstances of Greece might require. The Government of that day took care that the Convention should preserve to the House the opportunity of expressing its judgment on the transaction, and, accordingly, while the Emperor of Russia bound himself at once and unconditionally to guarantee one-third of the loan, the constitutional sovereigns of France and England only bound themselves, the one to recommend to the French Chambers, and the other to recommend to Parliament, the expediency of giving a similar guarantee. Some three or four years afterwards, in 1846, a question arose whether the British Government were bound to guarantee the second and third loans, if the other Powers did not adopt the same course; and the Government of that day, instead of taking it on themselves to decide the question, applied to the House of Commons for an Act to amend the original proceeding and to resolve the doubt. From 1832 to the present time no less than £977,000 had been paid out of the Consolidated Fund on account of the Greek loan. The treaty undoubtedly contained provisions for the repayment of the loan, which was to be a first charge on Greek revenues, but until the year 1847 the Greeks did not pay anything. In 1848, the attention of the Government having been called to the fact, some pressure was put upon that country, and about £40,000 was paid on account of the advances they had received. Greece was then allowed for some years to go to sleep again and to disregard its obligations, but in 1860 the British Government, in conjunction with the other protecting Powers, was moved to make a strong remonstrance against its disregard of the duties imposed by the Treaty of 1832. An investigation was made into the resources of Greece, and recommendations were made that she should forthwith set apart some 900,000*l.*, equal to £36,000 a year, in discharge of her obligations. In the same year the Greek Parliament voted £36,000 as a first instalment in accordance with that requisition, and £12,000, the third of that amount, was paid into the Consolidated Fund. But from that time Greece had been in a very troubled condition, and her troubles culminated in what he might call the politest revolution that had ever taken place, the King having been escorted on board ship and informed that he might go upon his travels to any other country. Negotiations were then set on foot to find him a successor and the country a King, and when the Prince of Denmark ascended the throne one of the terms of the proposal signed by the protecting Powers was, that out of the £36,000 a year which the Greek Government had engaged to pay annually, £12,000 a year should be paid to the Prince of Denmark, of which sum the proportion to be given by Great Britain would be £4,000 a year. When that proposal was laid on the table he called attention to the peculiar language in which it was couched, no reservation being contained as to the right of Parliament to express any opinion. The Under Secretary of State undertook that the matter should be considered, and the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald) having reminded the Government of their promise to explain, on the 8th of July the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was intended to afford Parliament an opportunity of expressing its views, but as it would be necessary to reduce the transaction into the form of a diplomatic act, that might not be accomplished before the close of the Session. After it had expired, the treaty which had been negotiated on the 13th of July was published, and as regarded the annuity to the King of Greece it was precisely in the same terms as the Protocol itself. Another treaty subsequent to the cession of the Ionian Islands was made, with a proviso that it should not endanger or in any way impair the obligations of the Treaty of 1832, or the transactions relating to the loan. The House, he thought, could hardly doubt that the making of treaties, disposing of the public money in those absolute terms, and without reserving any right to Parliament of expressing an opinion, was a matter which they were bound in some manner to notice. Nothing could be more clear than that all casual receipts, either derived from revenues at home or from foreign countries, belonged to, and ought to be paid into, the Consolidated Fund. An Act was passed in 1854 to abolish the practice of intercepting the public revenue in its way to the Consolidated Fund. In order that everything should go into the Consolidated Fund, Parliament also provided that hereditary pensions and other hereditary claims should be no longer paid out of special sources of revenue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 6th of July last year, in the fullest manner, accepted the doctrine that it was the duty of the Government to obtain the sanction of Parliament in all matters of this kind, and yet seven days afterwards Earl Russell signed a treaty by which the doctrine was set at naught, because, instead of reserving to Parliament the right of expressing an opinion, the treaty was made in absolute and definite terms that gave to Parliament no option. The prerogative of the Crown had, in fact, been exercised in a manner which set at naught the privileges of the House of Commons. Parliament had for many years interested itself in the right of the Crown to grant annuities out of the public revenue. In 1782 it was provided that no pension should be granted by the Crown of a greater amount than £1,200 without a previous Resolution and Address of both Houses of Parliament. It was further provided that no pension should be payable out of any particular source of revenue, but that all pensions should be paid at the Exchequer, so that they could not escape observation. There was one exception in favour of the families of the reigning Sovereign. It would be seen that the treaty in question violated both the rules laid down. At the end of the reign of George III. another Act was passed further to check the extravagance of the Sovereign. In that and every succeeding Act for the settlement of the Civil List, Mr. Burke's Act of 1792 was cited and made one of the regulating statutes. There could be nothing more clear than that Parliament had restrained the right of the Crown to grant annuities. The question of pensions again excited the attention of the House of Commons at the beginning of the reign of William IV., and a Resolution tending to restrain the power of the Crown in this respect was the cause of the change of Administration which placed the Whigs in power. That Resolution was in 1834 followed by another of a more stringent character—namely, that no pension should be granted by the Crown except for public services which were to be particularly stated. On the accession of Queen Victoria, and the arrangement of the Civil List, that Resolution was cited in the Act as the rule for the future granting of pensions. The Act further provided, that instead of the Queen having a large fund available for pensions she should have a stipulated sum of £1,200 a year for this purpose. Parliament had strictly limited the authority of the Crown in regard to the granting of pensions, but notwithstanding all these statutes the Government by this treaty had bound itself to grant an annuity to the King of Greece in a manner which deprived the House of Commons of all legitimate opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject. It was true that the Government had submitted to Parliament a Bill for confirming the annuity; but it was idle to ask the House to give an opinion on the Bill, as it was impossible to set at naught a treaty which had not only been ratified, but partly carried into effect. This treatment of the House of Commons contrasted forcibly with the liberty which had been given to the Ionian Parliament. The Protocol reserved to the Ionian Parliament the right of expressing an opinion on the dotation of £10,000 a year to the King of Greece. The Ionian Parliament formed an opinion of its own, and determined that the dotation should not be a separate charge on the Ionian Islands, but should be only a temporary charge until Greece and the Ionian Islands came to an agreement on the subject. The treaty had, consequently, to be altered in this sense. Her Majesty's Government were by no means so desirous to make provision for the public servants of Her Majesty in the Ionian Islands, for they had left them to be dealt with by a convention with the Greek Government, so that it might possibly happen that our pensioners in the Ionian Islands might be left to be paid out of the revenues of this country. The question was, whether before passing the Bill the House would not place on record some distinct declaration in regard to the power of the Crown to enter into engagements which affected the revenues of the country without first consulting Parliament. If the House were to allow this Bill to pass unchallenged it would form a most dangerous precedent. He was desirous of asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain how he could reconcile the terms of the treaty either with precedent or his own pledge; and if he could not do so, the House ought to place on the Journals some record of its opinion of such proceedings. In conclusion he begged to move that the grant to the King of Greece of an annuity of £4,000 out of moneys belonging to the Consolidated Fund by treaty not made subject to the sanction of Parliament was a violation of the privileges of the House of Commons.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Grant to the King of Greece of an Annuity of £4,000 out of monies belonging to the Consolidated Fund, by Treaty not made subject to the sanction of Parliament, is a violation of the Privileges of the House of Commons,"—(Mr. Ayrton),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would give the hon. Gentleman all the explanation in his power. He believed the hon. Gentleman had challenged the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government—first, with regard to the promise stated to have been made by them last Session; and, secondly, with respect to precedents in analogous cases. With regard to the promise, it had, he believed, been fulfilled, both in the letter and the spirit. In the record of the proceedings of the House he found that, in answer to a question put by the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. Fitzgerald), he stated that the sum in question, £4,000, must, in the first place, be the subject of diplomatic arrangement, and, as it would not be until after such an arrangement that Her Majesty's Government would be able to apply to Parliament for an Act, he apprehended they would not be able to submit a Bill upon the subject during that Session. Therefore, he stated distinctly that there would be an Act of Parliament, but that it could not be introduced until after the negotiations then pending, nor probably during the Session then drawing to a close. He spoke on the 6th of July, the treaty was signed on the 13th, but it was not ratified for a considerable time after. If, however, it had been ratified on the 13th of July, it would not have been possible or becoming to bring before the House, at such a late period of the Session, a question which, in a constitutional point of view, was one of a high order. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, had done exactly what they had engaged to do. But the hon. Gentleman had asked whether such a proceeding was in accordance with practice? It was fully in accordance with practice that when a sum of money to which the Crown of this country was entitled was surrendered by the Crown, that the surrender should be made by treaty, and it was not customary to make that surrender contingent upon the assent of Parliament. He admitted in a constitutional point of view that the assent of Parliament was necessary, but it was not usual to make it a condition in the diplomatic instrument. On the contrary, when the Crown undertook to pay a sum of money, it was customary to make that payment conditional on the assent of Parliament. But there was, in a formal point of view, a broad distinction between engaging to pay a sum of money which was to be levied upon the people and surrendering money which had never formed part of the revenue of the country. The difference between the Ionian Parliament and the British Parliament was founded upon that distinction which he had pointed out. Of this practical distinction it would be easy to give instances. There might be a distinction between surrendering a sum of money once for all, and making a surrender which would extend over a series of years. In the case of the Ionian Parliament, the question was to provide an income for the King of Greece out of the Ionian revenue, to be raised from year to year in the Ionian Islands. In this case the question was to provide him with a portion of his income, not out of the revenue of this country, but out of money due to us as part of a debt. There were two precedents which might be cited for the course which the Government had taken in this matter; the one in respect of the remission of certain claims upon Austria, the other of a similar remission with regard to Portugal. On the 22nd of January, 1815, a treaty was signed at Vienna, in which the King of England remitted to Portugal certain outstanding payments in respect of a loan of £600,000, which had been spent in the service of Portugal in the year 1809. In that instance the grant was never challenged or called in question by Parliament. He believed he was correct in saying, that no application was made to Parliament on the subject, and that the remission never received its sanction. Her Majesty's Government did not seek to cover themselves by that precedent, which, however, more than covered them. The other case was that of the Austrian loan, which was, perhaps, more immediately in point. In the year 1823 a convention was made between His Majesty the King of Great Britain and the Emperor of Austria, by which the latter engaged to pay £2,500,000, and the King agreed to accept that sum in satisfaction of all claims whatever on the Emperor, a much larger sum having been due to us under previous engagements. That was by a treaty signed at Vienna on the 27th of November, 1823, and in March, 1824, an Act was passed which recited the original proceedings, the raising of money on behalf of Austria, and likewise the convention to which he had just referred, and then it proceeded to enact in conformity with the provisions of that convention itself. Therefore, as far as precedent was concerned, he had shown that Her Majesty's Government had followed exactly that precedent which was before them. His hon. Friend might possibly say that it was the duty of Government to come down to Parliament with a proposal anterior to making the arrangements. But when last year he stated the course which the Government intended to pursue—namely, first to enter into a convention, and then to come to the House for its sanction, that explanation seemed satisfactory. Indeed, he did not think it would have been possible to come to Parliament for its sanction beforehand, for one peculiar reason, that the dotation, as it was called, of £4,000 a year was not a single arrangement; it was a small and limited portion of an extended political negotiation involving transactions with other parties. The hon. Gentleman appeared to apprehend that in a certain case this sum of money might have to be reimbursed out of the revenues of this country. He was not aware of any contingency in which such an obligation would arise. The money was not received and accounted for as part of the revenues of this country, and paid over into the hands of the King of Greece. The English Government were not bound, as far as he was aware, to see that the King of Greece received it; but in the terms of the convention they remitted so much of their claim on Greece as was represented by it. Therefore there was no engagement to pay the money in any contingency out of the revenues of this country. The question still remained, whether it would be possible to introduce any improvement into the established practice with regard to cases of this kind. That was a very fair matter for consideration, but it was not the subject at present before the House; and as the proceeding which had been taken was in accordance with the announcement made by the Government before the end of last Session, and with the course taken in former cases, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Amendment.

THE LAW COURTS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the buildings and sheds used for the Superior Courts of Law and Equity, and to the inadequate accommodation afforded by them. He had hoped to be spared the necessity of directing notice to this grievance, as last year the Government intimated that some steps would be taken to remedy it; but the introduction of their promised measures was still delayed. The House took great interest in the discussions relating to picture galleries or museums for the exhibition of art, but he was sure the country would think it of much greater importance than spending money even on such desirable objects that the courts in which justice was administered should be made worthy of the nation. The state of the Courts of Law was as bad as it possibly could be, and the word "sheds" fairly described many of the buildings used as courts. Last Session he called attention to this subject on account of the Second Court of Queen's Bench being obliged to close its sittings, because the Chief Justice stated that it was utterly unfit for a Court of Justice, and detrimental to the health of all attending it. In the present year the Judges of the Queen's Bench had again had occasion to complain of the places allotted to them for the purpose of exercising their functions. On a recent occasion, when a necessity arose for having a

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Second Court of Queen's Bench, no other place was at the time available for the purpose but a miserable room, with access by a dark staircase, which it was almost impossible to find. Justice on that occasion was certainly in a state of vagrancy, and had to hide her head from the suitors endeavouring to follow her, in an obscure chamber, where Mr. Justice Blackburn said that it was not possible to see, hear, or breathe. The state of the Courts at Westminster was shortly this, that eight courts were sometimes required, and there were only two fit for the despatch of business—the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Exchequer. The Court of Common Pleas, which was built when the serjeants only had audience there, was now much too small for its business, which amounted to one-third of the whole legal business of the country: The Bail Court, in which jury cases were now tried, was intended originally for the sitting of a single Judge to dispose of what were known as "bail cases," and might be likened to the "black hole," for it was below the ordinary surface of the ground, and had only one entrance. The Bar were accustomed to the annoyance, and had got in some degree acclimatized to it; but the public who had to discharge the duties of jurors and witnesses, had had no such training, and felt most severely the inconveniences to which they were subjected in consequence of the heat and want of ventilation. He did not know anything more painful than to address a jury in an incipient state of apoplexy. The Courts of Equity were, he believed, in some respects no better. [MR. MALINS: They are worse.] His hon. and learned Friend near him said that they were worse, and certainly he could say with regard to two of them that they might very properly be called sheds, or places of temporary shelter. Such sheds, with better ventilation, might make good cavalry barracks. In Guildhall matters were no better, some courts there being built on the model of cucumber frames with glass at the top. In Edinburgh and Dublin there were excellent courts, with libraries for the use of the Bar; but in London there was no court which had a library, or any room in which those attending the courts could study during the intervals of their engagements. There were also no waiting rooms for witnesses, so that they had either to sit or stand in court, or haunt the purlieus of Westminster Hall. There was not the slightest accommodation for jurymen. Frequently jurymen had to wait in court for several days before the cases on which they were summoned were called on. A merchant who had been summoned as a special juror wrote to him to say that he had to wait in court from ten till half past four, and that during the greater part of that time he was unable to obtain a seat; and he suggested that with the view of providing a room to which professional men, while waiting for the cases on which they had been summoned as special jurors, might retire for the purpose of writing letters and seeing their clerks on urgent business, special jurors should be paid only £1 instead of £1 1s. per day, and the odd shilling should be devoted to the providing of such a room. Was it, not a reproach to those who had the management of these affairs that such a suggestion should have been made by a juror? Several spasmodic efforts had been made to build new courts, but the evils which had been so long felt and so frequently complained of still remained. Bench, Bar, jurors, witnesses, and suitors had equally a grievance in the present state of affairs. A Commission—consisting of Sir John Coleridge, Sir W. P. Wood, Sir George Lewis, Sir R. Phillimore, and Mr. John Young, a solicitor of eminence—inquired into the subject in 1860, and, although attempts had been made since then to improve matters, they remained much the same as before. The Commission reported that the Bail Court was wholly unsuited for jury trials, that the Common Pleas was too small for the convenient discharge of business, and had sometimes to borrow a Parliamentary Committee-room or a Chancery Court for the purpose of a second court, that the Court of Exchequer was also inadequate, and that in the Queen's Bench, as in the other courts, the accommodation for Bench, Bar, and other parties was very defective. He thought he was entitled to expect from what was said when he drew attention to the question on a former occasion, that something would before now have been done. His hon. and learned Friend the present Solicitor General owned that there was a crying grievance, and the Attorney General also condemned the present state of the courts, declaring that an immediate remedy was required, and that, in his opinion, there were sufficient funds in hand for the purpose. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also said that the Government were waiting only for the concurrence of the House, and that after the encouragement which had been given he had no doubt they would not be unwilling to discharge the duty to which attention had been called. He was sorry that the Government had not as yet fulfilled that duty, but he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not plead that his words were uttered in the heat of debate, but would give effect to them. The lawyers were a long-suffering race, but he trusted that something would be done, without delay, to meet their just expectations in this matter. At the beginning of the Session the Chief Commissioner promised to bring in a Bill for the erection of new Law Courts between Carey Street and the Strand, but that promise had not yet been fulfilled. And on three other occasions the Government assured the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) that they would bring in a Bill on the subject. Something had been said about a financial difficulty, but he believed that means could easily be found, and, at all events, it was the duty of the Government to provide for the decent administration of justice. Luxurious accommodation was not asked for. Nothing more was required than such accommodation as would be consistent with the dignity of the country, and would promote the despatch of business, without occasioning inconvenience to those who were engaged in it. Quiet as the Session had been no stop had been taken, and now, unfortunately for the question, more exciting times were in prospect, but he hoped that the reproach which now rested on our legislation in this respect would speedily be removed.

MR. MALINS said, he regretted the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he wished to hear that right hon. Gentleman explain why the present state of things was allowed to continue. This was not a subject on which there was any difference of opinion. All agreed that the present state of things was disgraceful to the country. There were only two Equity Courts that were fit for the purpose, the Lord Chancellor's Court and the Lords Justices of Appeals' Court. As for the Equity Courts, no one would say that any of the three Vice Chancellors occupied a court fit for the administration of justice. And what accommodation was there for the transaction of that enormous mass of business which was referred to the Judges' Chambers? He reminded the House that four years ago, when he came down with the intention to put a question on this subject, his noble and learned Friend the present Lord Chancellor told him that the Government were going to bring in a great scheme, and that in two years they would have new courts open. Since that time not a single step had been taken on the subject. He had asked the right hon. Gentleman the Commissioner of Works again and again when the Bill was to be brought in, and he had been assured that it was intended to do it speedily. He had asked the Lord Chancellor on more than one occasion what was the cause of the delay. He could, however, get no satisfactory answer; and he concluded it arose from the consideration of money. The Attorney General had agreed to the necessity of the measure, the Solicitor General had agreed to it, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whose duty it would be to see that public accommodation was duly provided, had agreed to it. For three if not four Sessions notice had been given by the Government to owners of houses between Searle Street and Fleet Street, that they would require their property, and the inhabitants there were in a state of great inconvenience and uncertainty. One lady, who was the owner of property in Boswell Court, was almost reduced to a state of destitution, for she could not find tenants for her property because the Government would not make up its mind. His hon. and learned Friend had represented the condition of the Courts of Common Law. The Courts of Equity also were extremely bad. There were no waiting-rooms for witnesses, no retiring-rooms for juries; the Judge himself was obliged to retire to a room eight or nine feet square; and, in short, the whole state of things was a disgrace to the country. And what was the excuse offered? The Society of Lincoln's Inn had made a proposal to build three Vice Chancellors' Courts within the Inn, and lay out on them £100,000 if the Government would pay them £4 per cent on that outlay, and he confessed he would rather accept that proposal than that the present state of things should continue. If the Lincoln's Inn scheme could not be successfully promoted, he, for one, would concur in a general scheme which would place all the Courts of Law between Lincoln's Inn and Fleet Street. He thought that a case had been made out so clearly that the Government owed some explicit explanation to the House. The Government ought either to bring in a Bill at once, or declare their intention to abandon the question, so that the Courts of Equity connected with Lincoln's Inn might take their own course.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he was unable to understand what could be the obstacles to the introduction of the Bill on that subject. The dilatory pleas which had so often been put forward were hardly becoming, and the Government ought not to give reiterated promises if they had no bonâ fide intention of fulfilling them. The owners of property on the proposed site of the new Law Courts had been exposed to great loss, owing to the notices which had been constantly served on them during the last three years, and they had good reason to complain of the suspense in which they were kept, as well as the serious injury they sustained while the Government were making up their minds either to proceed with or abandon the scheme. He had asked before Easter whether it was intended to proceed with the measure, and he was told that the Bill would be brought in immediately after Easter, but it had not yet been introduced.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the intentions of the Government had been perfectly bonâ fide. Difficulties had, however, interposed which, very much against the will of the Lord Chancellor and everybody else concerned in the preparation of the measure, had caused it to be delayed till the present time. It would be possible, he believed, to bring the Bill in within a very short time, although at that period of the Session he was aware it must depend on the goodwill of the House whether it could pass that year. But, even if it did not then pass, there would be some advantage in having the plan, upon which the Government had at last determined, submitted to the House, so that it might be maturely considered by all who were interested in it before another Session commenced. He agreed that the evil and scandal of the present state of things could not possibly be exaggerated, and that it was an object of the most pressing importance that the Courts of Law and Equity and all the offices connected with the administration of justice in its various departments should be put on a worthier and more satisfactory footing. He was thoroughly convinced that no scheme could be satisfactory which did not aim at bringing the whole of the Courts together, thereby contributing to the greatest possible despatch, the saving of the time of suitors, and facilitating communication between all persons engaged in every branch of the administration of justice. It was true the Government two years previously brought in a Bill founded on the recommendations of the Commission of 1860. That Bill was met by an opposition mainly arising from the preference which some members of the legal profession felt for the plan proposed by Lincoln's Inn as to the Equity Courts. The Society of Lincoln's Inn was anxious to retain the Equity Courts within its own precincts, and desired their peculiar inconveniences to be remedied as soon as possible, whatever became of the case of the Common Law Courts. It would not, he thought, have been an expedient or long-sighted course to agree to that proposal. It would have tended to perpetuate one portion of the evil incident to the existing state of things, by separating one branch of the administration of justice from the rest, and interposing a real obstacle to the final and worthy settlement of that question. On the other hand, fears were expressed by some hon. Members—by the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge University amongst others—that the Government were about to launch on a boundless sea of expenditure, as had been done in regard to the building of the Houses of Parliament, and the House hesitated, chiefly on that account, to commit itself to their scheme. Before introducing another Bill on the subject the Department of the Government concerned in the matter had been very anxious to be quite sure of their ground, especially as to the pecuniary arrangements. The necessary inquiries had occupied, undoubtedly, a longer time than was anticipated at the beginning of the Session; but they were confident of being able to recommend to the House, and eventually they hoped to secure the adoption of, a measure which would obviate all the principal objections raised to the former project. In the first place, the Government had taken pains to ascertain by competent and independent opinions, whether the views of the architect consulted in the first instance, and who no longer had anything to do with the matter, could be safely relied on, and whether the estimates for the purchase of land and erection of buildings between Carey Street and the Strand were adequate. He was happy to state that the original estimate was fully borne out; they were confident that it was an outside estimate, and were confident it would not be exceeded even if the entire plans were carried into effect. A change had been made in the proposed method of dealing with the funds, which would obviate the necessity of throwing any charge upon the public purse. Instead of taking the whole of the funds considered to be available in Chancery, amounting in round numbers to £1,500,000, a portion would be reserved in order to recoup to the public any advances which might have to be made on account of annual charges. The difference it was proposed to make up partly by taking into account the value of the present buildings and sites for building, which would be gained to the public, and partly by having money advanced from time to time by the Public Loan Commission. It was proposed to spread the reimbursement of that portion of the loan over a considerable number of years, and to raise the moderate annual sum which would be required to pay interest and instalments of principal by fees of small amount to be laid upon the several steps and processes taken in those Courts deriving benefit from the new building which were unconnected with the Court of Chancery, and did not contribute any portion of the funds taken out of that Court. In that way the funds connected with the Court of Chancery, which were owned by no one and belonged to the public, would still contribute the principal portion of the cost, and the remainder would be distributed in the way he had explained. The necessary investigations relating to the plan of which he had given the outline had unavoidably occupied a considerable period of time; but if the House, generally, should be willing to entertain the project, there might be still time to pass it into law. At all events, it should be laid upon the table with as little delay as possible, and an opportunity of considering it afforded before the Session closed.

Mr. SELWYN said, the hon. and learned Gentleman, in his narrative of the reasons which induced the House to reject the former proposal, had overlooked one or two great difficulties which were felt at the time. He had also been very much surprised at the description which he gave of the Suitors' Fee Fund as a fund that belonged to nobody, and was the property of the public. Without discussing that question, he would assert that if the origin of the fund were considered, the purposes to which it was devoted, and the numerous claims continually made upon it, it would be impossible to maintain that view. Moreover, if the total expenditure of the court were placed on one side and the total receipts on the other, it would be seen that instead of an enormous surplus of a million and a half there was really but a balance of £200 or £300 a year; and this was obtained by taxation upon every stage of a cause,—the bill, the answer, the evidence, and the decree of the judge being all taxed. It was idle to talk of £1,500,000 being available. Proposals had been made to the Government to provide some of the requisite courts without any expense whatever to the State. It was only with regard to two out of the six Equity Courts that complaints were really tenable, and the Society of Lincoln's Inn had offered to erect the buildings requisite upon receiving from the Suitors' Fund an annuity of 4 per cent for the money they expended. The society made an alternative proposal to give the ground and to allow the Government to build courts for themselves. Therefore the reasons why the House rejected the original proposal were, among others, because they believed upon economical grounds that it was right to do so. It had been stated that the plan had been brought before the Earl of Derby's Government and rejected by them; thus, so far from having been rejected, it was in 1859 embodied in a Bill which was read a second time in the House of Lords, and backed with the official title of the then Lord Chancellor. He denied that the benchers of Lincoln's Inn had any personal influence whatever in the decision of the question. If the whole revenues of the Inn were confiscated, they would not be a sixpence the poorer; and they would gain nothing if those revenues were doubled or trebled. The idea of a gigantic building in which all the courts could be assembled was only an idea which could never be realized. Would the House of Lords, for instance, sitting in its judicial capacity, be removed to that building? Would the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council hold its sittings there? Was it proposed that all the Committees of both Houses of Parliament should institute their inquiries within its limits? If the Government were really in earnest in the matter, let them at once introduce the measure of 1859, which would pass without opposition, and before that time next year the courts which it contemplated would be built. The arguments in the Treasury Minute, which had been moved for by the hon. Member for Lewes, were conclusive against the proposed gigantic scheme. They showed the vast expenditure which would be necessary in order to buy up the houses between Carey Street and the Strand, the small surplus existing as between the income and expenditure of all the funds under the control of the Court of Chancery, and the large increase which was sure to take place between the estimate and the actual outlay. These arguments were just as applicable now as they were when the Minute was framed, and the Government would, therefore, do well to settle the question of the Courts of Equity at once and without delay, and afterwards it would be much more easy to find a site for the rest of the Law Courts, which possibly might be formed on the new Thames Embankment. He would therefore urge upon the Government the propriety of discarding their present scheme, as it had alone prevented a practical measure from being adopted, and to carry forward the Bill to which he had alluded.

MR. COWPER said, the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman was a good illustration of the difficulties which beset the question, and which had caused a delay that most persons deplored. The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke with great authority, and he entirely repudiated the general grounds upon which the whole of the legislation in the matter proceeded. Nothing, he said, was wanting in respect of accommodation for the Equity Courts, except two or three Vice Chancellors' Courts. But, from what he (Mr. Cowper) had been able to gather, the hon. and learned Gentleman's proposal was totally insufficient as regarded even the Courts of Equity; and with respect to the Law Courts, the wants of the profession and of the public quite prevented the Government from acceding to such a wretched piecemeal proposal. Why not, he said, adopt the scheme suggested in 1859 by Lord Chelmsford, by which two Vice Chancellors' Courts and certain chambers were to be erected? But, in that matter, he (Mr. Cowper) was content to walk humbly in the footsteps of the Earl of Derby's Government. In 1859, instead of adopting the scheme proposed by Lord Chelmsford, they appointed a Royal Commission upon the question of concentrating the Law Courts. The Report of that Commission met with such general approval on the part of the public, that it became the duty of the Government to endeavour to give effect generally to the recommendations contained in it; and the Government would not be doing what was expected from them by the profession and by the public, were they to abandon a great scheme which would be received as a boon by the profession at large—by solicitors as well as by counsel—for the sake of meeting the inconveniences felt by learned gentlemen practising in these two Vice Chancellors' Courts. Although the delay which had taken place had not mitigated the opposition of the hon. and learned Member, he was glad to say that some other persons thought better of the proposal, and the important aid of his hon. and learned Friend opposite, encouraged him to think that there might be a probability of obtaining the assent of the House to a scheme which was not open to the objections formerly urged against the proposal of the Government.

LORD HOTHAM said, he wished to know whether the Government had decided as to the choice of an architect?

MR. COWPER said, that he had stated from the beginning that the Government did not intend to select any particular architect, but meant to have a general competition.

BRITISH TROOPS IN CANADA. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ADDERLEY, who had given notice to move—

"That in the opinion of this House it is inexpedient that detachments of British troops should be stationed upon exposed posts on the Canadian frontier unless adequately supported by Canadian Forces"— said, that when he mentioned that there were at this moment along the North American frontier 9,000 British troops, it would be seen that the subject was not one of slight importance. Still, in the present state of the House, he could not expect to raise a debate; he would content himself by making a brief statement, which he hoped would induce an expression of opinion from the Government. These British troops were scattered in battalions, half-battalions, and companies, along a frontier of about 1,000 miles, with little power of communicating with each other, still less of communicating with the mother country. That was a hazardous position for British troops to occupy, and it endangered also the honour of this country should any emergency arise. These troops were not placed in Canada to guard against a rebellion. Canada could no longer rebel—for this simple reason, that she had nothing to rebel against. In common with most of our other colonies, she was now her own mistress almost completely; and this country was very little more than her tributary in respect of soldiers and money. The northern frontier was safe, for it was bounded by the Hudson's Bay territory, and was only liable to the invasion of polar bears. The western frontier along the sea was also free from danger. The southern frontier was in reality the only part where forces were needed for the defence of the country. That frontier embraced a territory 1,000 miles in extent, and it could not be imagined that such an area could be defended by troops from England further than in aid of the Canadians themselves. He might fairly presume that both parties desired to maintain that frontier. He believed that England was desirous of maintaining her connection with Canada from the fact that the noble Lord opposite was sanctioned by the opinion of this country in sending reinforcements to the rescue of the Canadians in 1861, when it was supposed that the Trent affair might possibly involve us in hostilities with America. Parliament approved his sending troops across the Atlantic at the most trying period of the year, and he believed he might conclude from that fact that we had no intention of allowing that frontier to be invaded with impunity. On the other hand, he believed he might conclude that Canada was equally desirous of maintaining that frontier and her relations with us from the way in which she had lately raised Volunteer and Militia forces. The question, however, was whether the present state of things was safe in spite of the precautions that had been taken; whether the precautions were at all sufficient. It had been maintained by some that there was no danger; but, if such were the case, they were hardly warranted in incurring the expense which they had already sanctioned. If there were no danger, we ought to withdraw our troops, and not leave 9,000 soldiers scattered needlessly through the country. But would anybody maintain that there was no danger in the present state of the American continent? A perusal of the publications of the country would suffice to dispel such an illusion, and show how strong was the feeling against England. Anybody who observed the preparations which America was at present making must perceive that such preparations were dictated by the anticipation of a rupture with this country. It was maintained by some that even if there be danger, it is wholly the affair of England, but that was a position which he entirely disputed. Apart from the fact that it would be impossible for us to defend the country alone, he believed that the affair was far more theirs than ours; the Canadians were much more likely to involve us in a war than we to inflict one upon them. They had as free a constitution as ourselves, the Executive represented the same Sovereign power of peace and war, and their legislative action was as likely to lead to war as ours, and as capable of refusing or granting supplies. It was again urged that allegiance and protection were reciprocal duties, but military service was part of the British allegiance. The English could not undertake the defence of all their fellow-subjects over the world, relieving them of raising troops of their own for that purpose. The noble Lord had said only a few minutes before, in reference to the Danish question, that England could not adopt the course to which her natural impulse might prompt her, because she had not the force sufficient to hazard a European war; and if England were involved in an European war, she certainly would have to withdraw her troops from Canada. Canada must look to her own defence, for the very situation rendered the protection of the Canadian frontier by England impossible. Out of the 1,000 miles of frontier 600 miles were along the lakes, and these lakes were largely covered with an American mercantile marine ready for warlike use. A large extent of the remainder of the frontier was composed of a river averaging two miles in width, but studded with islands, while the river during a considerable portion of the year was so severely frozen as to allow of the carriage of the heaviest artillery. For the rest of the distance the boundary was merely imaginary. He wished also to point out the fact, that though it might be desirable to have a few British troops stationed in Canada as a nucleus for the defence of the country, it would be very dangerous to have them scattered in distant positions. They ought to be concentrated in one spot, and that spot ought undoubtedly to be Quebec. And yet Quebec at that moment was utterly insecure. The right bank of the river was, he believed, wholly unfortified, and the fortifications of the place generally were in such a state that a well-disciplined army with present means of war would, he believed, find little difficulty in making themselves masters of it. The duty of the local troops was to drill and to acquire something like training and organization, which, at present, they did not possess. Their basis of operations ought to be either Montreal or Toronto, which places should be immediately put into a state of defence, but that should be clearly stated to be their own affair. Sir Francis Head, some years ago, had recommended Toronto as the real military basis for Canada, and had also recommended the fortification of Montreal as a connecting link with Quebec. With respect to the navy, although the English fleet could render valuable support to Canada, yet it could not act in the interior, and by treaties we were debarred from keeping gunboats upon the lakes. Sir Francis Head had stated that in the event of a contest the Americans would be able to wage war at a cost of a shilling where it would cost us a guinea. When the antagonists were equally matched in courage and skill the elements of additional cost was not to be overlooked. It was true the English navy might retaliate on the seaboard for any injuries done to Canada, but it would be very unsatisfactory to have to trust to that kind of warfare whilst the interior of the country was ill-defended. He would say that before any emergency arose the troops of England should be placed in garrison at Quebec, leaving the Canadian troops to defend all the rest of the frontier; and if the Canadians were not disposed to take measures for the defence of their own country, then he would recommend the withdrawal of the English troops; but as those troops were now placed it would be impossible for them even to withdraw in case of sudden war without disaster or disgrace. With respect to the navy, he would observe that in these days of iron-clads it was much better to build ships of war on the spot than to have to transport them 3,000 miles across the Atlantic; and if we undertook the naval defence of Canada against the United States from this country the Americans would have a great advantage in this respect in the proximity of their resources. It was often put as a reason why the connection between this country and Canada should be maintained, that if Canada was annexed to the United States she would become the nursery of a great marine for that Power. He would ask why Canada should not now become a nursery for seamen for us? Why should we not develop her naval power? Reverting to the troops in Canada, he found that they numbered about 9,000, of whom 6,000 were at Montreal and Quebec, 1,000 at Kingston, and the remainder at Toronto, London, and other places. The Volunteer militia amounted to 35,000 men, the number having been raised under recent Acts from 5,000, which was the original proposal. That circumstance, he thought, showed that Canada, if properly called upon, was willing and able to develop her own resources. Nothing prevented that development but the ill-defined relations existing between Canada and the mother country. We allowed indefinite and deceitful expectations to paralyze their action. If England undertook to garrison Quebec and to maintain a certain amount of naval force, leaving the remaining defences to be provided by Canada, there was no doubt that there was sufficient spirit in the Canadians to insure these defences being provided as soon as they saw clearly that the responsibility rested with them. The Volunteer militia were now distributed—15,000 in the west, 5,000 in the central districts, and 15,000 in the eastern, but the drill was only for six days in the year—an amount of training that was obviously insufficient. In addition there was the ordinary militia, which amounted upon paper to 150,000 men, but which force, at present, was nothing but an abstract liability existing only upon paper. The results of such a system had been seen in the United States at the beginning of the present war, when an enormous militia, upon paper, afforded neither officers nor men. Lord Monck had shown his usual good sense in applying the small sum voted by the Canadian Parliament for the militia to the instruction of officers, who were even of greater importance than men. He trusted that the emergencies to which he had alluded would never arise, but it was neither safe nor prudent to close their eyes to possible dangers. He wished the Government to remove from the minds of hon. Members a feeling of anxiety as to the position of the troops in Canada, and to assure them that our troops in that important colony, and at that critical period, should not be left in a position which would expose them to the risk of a discreditable withdrawal.

MR. CARDWELL said, he entirely agreed in the statement and language of the Motion—

“That it is inexpedient that detachments of British troops should be stationed upon exposed posts on the Canadian frontier, unless adequately supported by Canadian Forces;”

and with respect to the observations made by his right hon. Friend, there was really much in which he was also enabled to concur. He began by paying a just tribute to his noble Friend at the head of the Government for the decision and vigour he displayed in sending, at a moment of emergency, a large reinforcement of British troops to Canada. His right hon. Friend also admitted that the main defence of Canada must ultimately rest in the spirit, vigour, and determination of the people of Canada, as must be the case in every country. He therefore held with his right hon. Friend that a nucleus of British troops, supported by the energy and determination of the Canadians, was the natural and just defence of Canada; and such he believed to be the feeling of the Canadians themselves. His right hon. Friend had paid a just tribute to the Governor of Canada, and did justice to the improved spirit of Canada itself. In all these points he entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend. Perhaps, however, it would not be uninteresting to the House if he were to state the changes which had recently been made, leading in the direction of insuring the defence of Canada by the Canadians. In October last the Canadian Legislature passed Acts for the new organization of the Militia and the Volunteers, declaring that the public defence was a duty binding on every member of society, providing the machinery for insuring the performance of it by each individual; making provision for securing the thorough education in military duty of all militia officers, and compelling all candidates for commissions to attach themselves for instruction to British regiments. Provision was made for additional pay from provincial resources for the officers and men of Her Majesty's forces who should assist in this training. Lord Monck, in one of his despatches, described that legislation as

"Sound in principle, calculated to have a most beneficial effect on the present efficiency of the militia force, and to create and foster in the future a taste for military pursuits among the population."

The general effect of these measures will be to give us in the province service battalions of militia to any amount the Commander-in-Chief may from time to time think desirable, with a machinery constantly in existence for the indefinite increase of their numbers; a body of thoroughly well-trained officers attached to the service battalions of militia, living among men of their battalions, and competent to train them in their drill, and command them when called out for exercise or duty. For the purpose of training officers the House would be glad to learn that schools had been established at Quebec and Toronto for the reception of candidates for the militia, and the attendance had been as large as was considered desirable. Writing in the month of April last, Lord Monck said—

"The schools for the instruction of the militia officers are working well. The officers of Her Majesty's army who have charge of these schools appear to me to work with great energy and judgment, the candidates for commissions are coming forward in larger numbers than we can at the moment admit to the schools, and display great industry and intelligence in the acquisition of military knowledge; and I am very sanguine in my expectations that we shall have, before long, scattered over the entire colony, a body of well instructed men capable of commanding the provincial militia should their services be required."

He entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend that the first and foremost object was to provide trained, energetic, skilful, and spirited officers; but his right hon. Friend spoke of the numbers of the Volunteers without any allusion to the number fixed for the Militia. That number had been fixed at 88,000. There was, therefore, now an organization usefully existing in Canada which contemplated the provision of a body of trained officers—a body of Volunteers to which his right hon. Friend had referred, and a body of Militia capable of indefinite extension according to the discretion of the Governor General, but at the present moment fixed at 88,000. That was only a preliminary organization; but it proved that at least the Canadians were alive to their duty and interest, and he hoped they would soon see existing in Canada a Native force capable of rendering efficient aid to the Queen's trained soldiers, which, in the opinion of both sides of the House, was the proper mode of providing for the defence of Canada. He entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend that, without entertaining any special fear as to any danger to the foreign relations of this country with our neighbours in that part of the world, the dispersion of British troops in small numbers in distant parts of Canada was not a policy wise in itself or expedient under the circumstances. That was his opinion, and it was also the opinion of his noble Friend the Secretary of War. When the Guards were withdrawn from Canada, an opportunity occurred for greater concentration, and he would read an extract from a despatch written by his noble Friend to Lieutenant General Sir F. Williams, dated May 25, 1864—

Mr. Cardwell

"This decision will render it possible to concentrate the troops remaining under your command by the withdrawal of those now stationed to the westward of the very extended line of the Canadian frontier; and I am directed to inform you that Lord De Grey requests that you will take the earliest steps to effect such a concentration, as Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that it is highly desirable to retain the troops in Canada in two principal masses at Quebec and Montreal, and to diminish as far as possible the number of scattered stations in that colony other than the small posts occupied by the Royal Canadian Rifles for the purpose of checking desertion."

His right hon. Friend, indeed, went further, and would concentrate the troops exclusively at Quebec. That was an opinion in which he could not entirely concur. The Government thought that Montreal and Quebec were the natural points for the concentration of Her Majesty's forces in Canada. He also thought it might be very wise and expedient that a clear and definite policy should be laid down by Her Majesty's Government, and communicated to those in Canada who were responsible for the well-being of the province; and that the co-operation of the Canadian people should be invited in any measures which they thought it expedient to provide for the defence of the country. It was an important question. It had engaged the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government, and he had stated the principles on which it ought to be conducted. He cordially agreed in those views, and he cordially concurred in thinking that this country, in directing the foreign policy of her colonies, ought to furnish the nucleus of the force for the defence of those colonies, but that their main defence must turn upon the spirit and energy of their own people; and he thought that a frank communication between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada would suggest the best mode of arranging the just proportion of the burdens to be borne by the Home Government and the dependencies of this country.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that the House and the country would be disposed to concur in the principles which the right hon. Gentleman had just laid down, and to be of opinion that the line of policy which he indicated that it was his intention to take was the safe one for this country to adopt. But his fear was, that the right hon. Gentleman and the Canadian Government were not sufficiently alive to the exigencies of the period in point of time. No doubt if they all lived long enough, and if peace should last as long as they hoped it would between the United States and this country, the measures which he had sketched out would bring a satisfactory solution of the difficult question of the local defence of Canada. But his fear was, that the right hon. Gentleman's plan contained the germs of great delay, and the right hon. Gentleman's tone made him fear that he was not sufficiently alive to the great promptitude necessary, and the imminent risk of dangers which no one liked to contemplate. The right hon. Gentleman began by describing the preparations which the Canadians were making for defence. As he understood the right hon. Gentleman, the Canadians were contemplating a training college and a militia.

MR. CARDWELL: I said that the training schools are actually in progress, and are training so great a number as to lead the Governor General to express a hope there would shortly be a sufficient number of trained officers to lead the Militia.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, it appeared that, as soon as the schools had trained the officers, and as soon as the Canadian Government had got round them the organization of the militia, and as soon as the Canadian Parliament had proceeded to vote sufficient supplies, then by that time the militia would be in existence. But his fear was, that the emergency would be a little too pressing for such a lengthy process. The right hon. Gentleman and Earl De Grey agreed that our forces ought not to be scattered, but that with the exception of a certain number of posts they were to be massed in Montreal and Quebec, in neither of which cities he believed were any fortifications that would enable a small number of troops to hold their ground against a large force. They all hoped that hostilities would not break out with America; but still they were possible, and they ought to look to the dangers that awaited them if war were declared. They knew the dangers which they had to face. They knew that the Northern army in the field was estimated by hundreds of thousands, and that it had been able, in spite of the resistance of another army almost equally large, to force its way through an extended frontier, and, at all events, to occupy a considerable portion of territory. There was no force in Canada equal to that of the Confederates. Suppose that at the end of the year there should be a termination of hostilities between the North and South—suppose the exigencies and existence of a large armed force, the pressure of political difficulties, and the confusion consequent upon the termination of a civil war, should lead the Northern statesmen to find an issue from their difficulties in making a raid upon Canada. He would not say that was likely, but it was possible, and then we should have to defend that enormous frontier, partly without natural defence and partly consisting of lakes upon which we were forbidden to have warlike ships, but which the warlike ships of America might reach. The British Government and the Canadians would in that case have to defend that enormous frontier against the army which had crushed the heroic army of the South. That was a very serious danger; but if the Canadians did not choose to make preparations, and allowed their territory to be overrun, it was their affair and not ours. If the result of the neglect and delay, after the warnings they had received, should be that their country was overrun, then, although of course the people of England would be sorry for what might happen, yet he did not think we could cast any great blame upon ourselves for the result. But the terrible thing would be if any considerable body of British troops were surrounded and made prisoners. The feeling which such a disgrace would occasion would be very humiliating; it would stimulate us to enormous exertions; it would embitter the war between the two countries, and make us feel that we had contracted a stain on our escutcheon, which it would require some very extraordinary military achievements to wipe out. He thought the right hon. Gentleman's measures were perfectly sound, but he was not sufficiently alive to the imminence of the danger of our position—namely, that while the British troops were slowly massing in Montreal and Quebec, the whole of the coast would remain unfortified and exposed to the attacks of any such army as the Northern States might bring against them. While that was going on, and while the Canadians would be going through these dilatory preliminaries and these measures of rudimentary self-defence, some great disaster might fall on our arms which no one would regret more than the right hon. Gentleman, but for which regrets would be a vain and idle remedy. Perhaps it might be owing to the suavity with which the right hon. Gentleman habitually conveyed everything to the House that he had misunderstood the tendency of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. [Mr. CARDWELL. The orders have already gone out!] Yes, but what he doubted was whether the orders were sufficiently prompt for the occasion. He should be happy to hear that orders had been sent out to fortify immediately the two posts of Quebec and Montreal, or, if that was not possible, that one only should be occupied, and that not one post should be held except what British troops might safely hold with such aid as Canada might furnish. Anything short of that would expose the British army to the risk of almost irreparable disgrace. The House could not hope for a more detailed account of the right hon. Gentleman's policy, but he would venture to press upon him the suggestion that precautions of that kind ought not to be left until the moment when danger arose. The requisite concentration which the military policy of the Government would require would then wear an aspect of fear, and it would look as if we were deserting our colonists. Promptitude in these matters was requisite above all things, and if he might refer to the debate of that day week he thought the right hon. Gentleman would recognize that if the virtue of promptitude had been more thoroughly exercised; and if, in the moment of security, something more of forethought had been shown in regard to the impending dangers, the disgrace and the disasters which were then discussed would never have occurred. He trusted that no such disgrace and disasters would occur to our army in Canada.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he would remind the noble Lord that in his estimate of the dangers to which Canada was exposed and her means of protection, he had omitted one of the most important elements of her safety. The noble Lord seemed to have forgotten that war with Canada on the part of the United States meant war with England also, and that the United States in deciding upon an invasion of Canada, would have to take into account not merely the preparations made for the defence of Canada, but the serious and tremendous consequences to herself, her coasts, and commerce, consequent upon engaging in war with England. With regard to the arrangements made for the improvement of the militia of Canada, he believed them to be of a very valuable character, although still imperfect. The whole province of Canada would now be covered by a military organization, and would be defended by militia of a certain class, containing no soldiers above the age of forty-five. Every man would know the battalion to which he belonged, where he must resort for purposes of drill and muster, and the officers under whom he was to serve. They would be drilled for a period of the year which, he would admit, was not sufficiently long, but still drilled so as to give them such a knowledge of soldiering as would in a short time turn them into good troops. Lord Monck and his Government were engaged in providing a number of first class-officers, and the result, it was expected, would be a highly efficient militia in Canada. In Toronto and Quebec, where two of the finest regiments in Her Majesty's service had been placed, there were military schools in which as large a number of officers as there were means of instructing were undergoing military training. With respect to another question, which was now one of great importance, the House, as the right hon. Gentleman knew so well, had long looked with great suspicion upon the subject of colonial fortifications, and those who had charge of colonial affairs in this country had been very shy indeed in proposing to the House any expenditure for that purpose. It was admitted, however, by the right hon. Gentleman, and would be allowed by the House, that Quebec was an exception to the general rule, and there was hardly a place within our colonial dominions in which Parliament would see with less jealousy the expenditure of money for making the place fit for the reception of Her Majesty's troops. The Government had recently received a Report from a skilful officer on the defences of Canada, and especially with regard to Quebec and Montreal. With regard to the concentration of the troops, he believed they were actually, or with a slight exception, in Quebec and Montreal—that exception being small parties of the Canadian Rifles, who were sent to certain parts of the colony to prevent desertion. Preparations had thus been made to prevent future danger. Some of them were already in progress, and the remainder were under the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

UNITED STATES—CLEARANCE OF BRITISH SHIPS AT NEW YORK.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to call attention to a subject which was of considerable importance to a branch of colonial trade—that, namely, between New York and Jamaica. A New York firm, Messrs. Cordova and Co., had been in the habit for a considerable time of shipping provisions to Messrs. Levy and Co., a mercantile house in Jamaica, to the extent of £100,000 a year. These provisions were disposed of by Messrs. Levy in the ordinary course of business in Jamaica. These gentlemen had informed him (Mr. Cave) that they had no trade whatever with the Southern States, and it was, of course, extremely unlikely that they would ship contraband of war from the port of New York. The trade, in fact, was of a most legitimate and ordinary character. However, a short time ago, Mr. Levy, the head of the Jamaica firm and a member of the House of Assembly in that island, now in England, received a letter from his New York correspondent, dated May 28, informing him that the ship Leonard Berry, consigned to his firm, together with the Perilia, another ship loaded for the same destination, and all other vessels clearing for Jamaica, had been stopped by the Collector of Customs, under a regulation requiring captains and shippers to furnish bonds to the United States, not that the vessels would sail for the port named in their papers, which would be right enough, but that the cargoes were intended for the consumption of Jamaica, and would never be used for the benefit of the Confederate States; that three bonds were required, with sureties qualifying in real estate to the amount of twice the value of the cargo, or in the case of the Leonard Berry to 100,000 dols., or in round figures to £20,000, and that there was no provision for cancelling these bonds, even upon the certificate of the United States Consul in Jamaica that the cargo had been landed, but the bonds were to insure for all time, subject to the production of some evidence which might lead to their forfeiture. The writer probably did not exaggerate when he called this an embargo on Jamaica ships; and it must be a prohibition to the trade, as no trade could exist under such restrictions. It seemed, however, that a novel trade in bonds had sprung up under this regulation, and that people were willing to run the risk of being sureties at a price of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the value of the cargo. The same regulations applied to Nassau, Bermuda, and Matamoras with more reason, perhaps, because those places had notoriously imported far more than their population warranted, but still contrary to international law, or, at any rate, to the comity of nations. Jamaica, however, had a population of 400,000 to be supplied, and had always carried on a considerable trade with New York; and if it was argued that blockade runners had sailed from Kingston, the same might be said of Liverpool, and fifty other ports. Similar restrictions had been placed on the trade to Halifax and St. John, New Brunswick, but they had been removed, as contrary to the Reciprocity Treaty. They had also been applied to Havannah, but had likewise been withdrawn on the Captain General of Cuba threatening that he would refuse clearances to American vessels in every port of Cuba. In this case the British Consul tried in vain to obtain a relaxation of the rule, and an appeal had been made to Lord Lyons. Since the letter of May 28 was written, intelligence had arrived that in this special case the security of the shippers had been received, and so the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent payment had been saved, but the regulations remained unchanged. He (Mr. Cave) had no sympathy with those who, in defiance of the Queen's proclamation, supplied munitions of war to either belligerent. Those who carried contraband of war must also run their chance, but it seemed unjust that fair traders should be subject to these arbitrary restrictions, and certainly unworthy and impolitic in the British Government to submit to them. The letter to which he had referred stated that our quiet submission to such arbitrary conduct had excited anything but respect on the other side of the Atlantic. He therefore wished to know whether any information on this subject had been received from Lord Lyons, and whether instructions had been sent, or, if not, whether they would be sent to him to protest against a system so injurious to an important branch of our colonial commerce?

MR. LAYARD said, the subject which the hon. Gentleman had brought before the House had given considerable trouble to Her Majesty's Government and to Lord Lyons. He was not aware that the particular case described by the hon. Gentleman had been reported to the Government; but Lord Lyons had informed them that those restrictions had been imposed upon vessels going to Jamaica and the West Indies. The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown had been taken on the subject, and it was to the effect that the restrictions were illegal and vexatious. As for requiring that goods which had been landed at a neutral port should never find their way to the Confederate States, there was no doubt that those terms were altogether beyond the competence of the United States Government to impose, and in consequence of the representations of Her Majesty's Government those restrictions had in many cases been removed. One or two of those cases were under the consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown, and instructions would be sent to Lord Lyons to make strong representations to the United States Government on the subject.

RECRUITING FOR THE ARMY.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL DUNNE said he rose, pursuant to notice, to call attention to the subject of Recruiting for the Army. The question was one of the highest importance and demanded the utmost consideration of the military authorities, inasmuch as the fact was notorious that enlistments had been gradually decreasing for the last few years, and if something were not done to check the downward course it was obvious that the efficiency of the army would be seriously impaired. He held in his hand a Return, which showed that a great falling off had taken place within a few years in the number of men enlisted. In 1860 the number enlisted in the United Kingdom was 21,664, but in 1863 the number was only 6,924, and in the year before that the number was 4,642. In 1859, on the Motion of the then Secretary for War, a Commission was appointed to examine the subject, and that Commission, which was presided over by a distinguished officer, made several recommendations, all of which, he believed, were carried out, though not to the full extent; but there were several causes which tended to prevent an increase in the number of men enlisted. One of those causes was the high wages generally received in England by the class of men from whom the recruits for the army were taken. That cause did not operate in Ireland, but on the other hand the vast immigration which was carried on from that country and the consequent diminution of the population made it difficult to get recruits there. Then there were certain proceedings which acted on the feelings of the people, and discouraged them from joining the army. There was, too, great uncertainty in the service, the army being sometimes increased to a considerable extent and then suddenly reduced. Then there existed great uncertainty in reference to pensions. Men who had become soldiers were frequently thrown on the world without a pension, because, if they were disabled by disease, they were told that they had the seeds of the disease in them when they enlisted. He thought that when a man passed the medical officer he ought not to be subject to the contingency of losing his pension by an attack of heart or other disease. Another cause which deterred men from enlisting was the concentration of troops in large camps, such as had been formed at Aldershot and at the Carragh. Formerly, when a regiment returned from foreign service, it was quartered in some town where the men had an opportunity of meeting their friends, or, at all events, of mixing with persons of their own class and obtaining some relaxation; but in these camps the drill was so constant and severe that many men regarded foreign service as a relief. Other objections arose out of the method of reckoning service, and the deductions which even after the improvements that had recently been introduced were still made from the nominal pay of the men. The pay of an infantry soldier was 1s. 1d. a day, including the 1d. beer money. From even that small sum there were many deductions, leaving him only about 4d. a day for himself. Another cause of difficulty arose from the limitation of the period of enlistment. According to the evidence of Sir George Wetherall, when examined before the Commission, the diminution of the period of service to ten years would render it necessary that we should, exclusively of the men required for India, enlist annually, instead of from 10,000 to 12,000 men, 23,000. He doubted whether our population would supply us with enough men to meet all our wants. The standard had been lowered from 5ft. 7in. to 5ft. 5in., but we had not got the number of recruits that were needed. He knew that recruiting had lately very much increased, but that arose from the circumstance that the militia had recently been out for their annual training, and we could not anticipate any continuous flow of men from that source. He now came to the encouragements to men to enlist, and to the changes which he thought ought to be made. One great encouragement, that of promotion from the ranks to commissions, had singularly failed. The Commission stated, that although, in ten years, 570 men had been promoted from the ranks, recruiting had during that time been more active in the Indian service and the artillery, in which no such promotion was offered. One great reason why men did not enter the army was the insufficiency of the pay, and it was necessary that both that and the marching allowances should be increased. When men were on the march they often suffered much from the insufficiency of their pay and the want of food. When men were fed well they drank less. As to the time of service, in the cavalry men were enlisted for twelve years, and in the infantry ten years. He confessed he could never understand the distinction. It was, he thought, most desirable that men should, if they chose, be allowed to enlist in the infantry for a longer period than ten years. If a man entered the army at the age of sixteen or eighteen years, he was, after he had served ten years, fit to go into any other business, and had great inducements to leave the service; but he was then at his prime as a soldier, and it was most desirable to retain him in his regiment. Sufficient inducements were not, in his opinion, held out to lead men to re-enlist in India. Many men who took their discharges there and came home no doubt afterwards re-enlisted; but the State was put to the expense of paying their passages to this country and out to India again, and it would, therefore, be good economy to hold out inducements to them to continue their service in that country. The best thing, in his opinion, that could be done was to raise the pay of the soldier as his period of service increased. He believed that would prove more efficacious than adding to the bounty as an inducement to men to enter the army.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was glad the hon. and gallant Member had called the attention of the House to the subject, as it would give him an opportunity of removing the misapprehension which seemed to prevail in the public mind regarding it. The Returns of men enlisted at the various recruiting stations to which reference had been made no doubt showed that a considerable decrease had taken place since 1860. These Returns, however, were confined to the recruiting stations, and did not embrace the number of men who were enlisted at head-quarters. If in 1861, 1862, and 1863 the number enlisted at the stations was extremely small, it was because more men were not wanted, as the strength of the army was being gradually reduced. There was, therefore, as far as these Returns were concerned, not the smallest ground for alarm. That was the first year since 1860 in which there had been any pressure whatever in supplying the demand for recruits. A large body of men would be entitled to their discharge, and it was no wonder if the recruiting machinery, which had during the last year or two become rather rusty through disuse, should not be capable all at once of meeting the requirements of a sudden emergency. It therefore became necessary for the Horse Guards to issue fresh instructions on the subject; but there was nothing in the Horse Guards' Circular at all of a novel character. It was intended only to remind officers in charge of recruiting parties of various things which were formerly well known, but which had been somewhat forgotten of late years, owing to the limited operation of the system. He did not think that there was the slightest ground for apprehension as to the number of men required for the army that year not being obtained, as the increased efforts consequent upon the issue of the Circular had proved entirely successful. In the end of the last and the beginning of the present year the Commander-in-Chief and the military authorities in charge of the recruiting department were rather afraid that there might be difficulties in raising the establishment to its proper figure. The number of recruits, however, for whom levy money was asked did not exceed 21,300, including the Indian service and all the men entitled to take their discharge. Of that number a little over 10,000 were the men entitled to their discharge; but from past experience it was calculated that between 50 and 60 per cent of those men would re-enlist; and if only 5,000 out of the 10,000 should realize that expectation, the actual number of recruits required during the year would only be 16,000. But during the last three weeks, when recruiting had been commenced with increased activity, there had been obtained an average of 353 men each week, which would give 18,356 for the year. There was no reason to fear that that rate of recruiting could not be kept up, because this was the worst season of the year for it. It was the period of the hay harvest, which would be followed by the corn harvest, and there was more abundant employment throughout the country than at any other time during the year. Under these circumstances, it was scarcely necessary to follow the hon. and gallant Member through his remarks as to the means which ought to be taken to induce men to enlist. He had shown that recruits were not at present deterred from joining the army. The hon. and gallant Member had alluded to the recommendations of the Commission appointed by the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon. Some of the recommendations of the Commission had been adopted, but some of them—such as that in regard to increase of pay for increased service—had not yet been carried out. The Ten Years' Act ought to have a fair trial before any alteration was made. It was quite possible that after further experience of the measure it might be found necessary to re-arrange the terms of service, but it was extremely undesirable to adopt a new system when there was no pressure, and the existing plan had not been fully tested. He was sorry the hon. and gallant Member had spoken of the 1s. a day as if it represented the soldier's pay in the same way as the 1s. 6d. or 2s. earned in other employments. Everybody must, he thought, admit that so far as food, clothing, and pocket-money went, our soldiers were in a much better position than almost any class of labourers in the country. He did not, of course, mean to compare the position of the soldier with that of the skilled labourer. In seeking for recruits the Government did not pretend to compete with the demand for skilled labour; all they could do was to enter into competition with the ordinary labour-market, and a minute investigation of the pay and allowances which a soldier enjoyed would, he felt assured, be sufficient to convince any man that his position was superior to that of the unskilled labourer. He received good rations and his clothes and lodgings for nothing, besides other advantages. The only other point in the speech of the hon. and gallant Member to which he thought it necessary to refer was that in which he stated that men in the regiments serving in India and the colonies were brought home, at great expense to the nation, only, perhaps, to be re-enlisted in this country. Now, with respect to that point, he could only say that a sum was taken in the Estimates for increase of bounty to men re-enlisting in the colonies. In India a man received a considerable sum for re-enlisting on the spot, instead of putting the country to the expense of bringing him home. He did not know what other plan could be adopted in order to attain the object which the hon. and gallant Member seemed to have in view, because a soldier naturally wished to come home at the expiration of his ten years' service. The only way of preventing him from doing so was to offer him a sum which he would be likely to consider it worth his while to accept. In conclusion, he had simply to observe that he felt obliged to the hon. and gallant Gentleman for having brought the subject forward, because from certain letters which appeared in the newspapers it would seem as if a general impression prevailed that recruiting had come to a stand-still, whereas, as he had stated, it was progressing at a rate which if kept up, as there was every reason to hope it would be, would more than meet the wants of the service.

nary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Extraordinary Disbursements of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad."

MR. DODSON said, he wished to call attention to the inconvenient form in which the Votes for the diplomatic service were submitted to Parliament, and to the inadequate information as to the real cost of that service afforded to the House. All that hon. Members generally knew on the subject was that there was a sum of £180,000 a year charged on the Consolidated Fund for the purpose of paying diplomatic salaries, which sum was entirely at the disposal of the Foreign Office, and over the expenditure of which the House had no control. He held in his hand, he might add, a Return which showed that in the year ending the 31st of March, 1863, there was spent on the diplomatic service a sum of £111,000 — the actual sum voted, he believed, being £157,000 — in excess of the £180,000 to which he had alluded. In order, however, to find how that money had been disposed of, it was necessary to hunt over five different classes of Estimates, while the expenditure of some of it was to be found under the head of Consuls, some under that of Consular Compensations, and some under the head of Miscellaneous Expenditure. Now, the various items of the outlay for the army and navy were presented to the House in a consecutive manner, and he should like to know why the same course should not be pursued with regard to the diplomatic service. He objected, too, to having any portion of that expenditure withdrawn from the cognizance of the House of Commons by being charged on the Consolidated Fund, and should wish to see the whole of it annually submitted to the House for its approval. If not, the information with respect to it ought, at all events, he contended, to be supplied in an intelligible manner. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the reduction of the Vote by £10,000.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £17,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Extraordinary Disbursements of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad."—(Mr. Dodson.)

MR. LAYARD said, his hon. Friend had brought the question forward during several Sessions, but he begged his hon.

Friend to bear in mind that while many other Votes showed an increase, the Vote for diplomatic salaries had remained stationary, with the exception of the charges for China and Japan; and the missions to these two countries were of a mixed political and commercial character, our minister in China being ambassador and superintendent of trade, and our representative in Japan being both envoy and consul general. The confusion in the accounts which the hon. Member seemed to think existed arose from the arrangement made some years ago for charging the cost of the diplomatic service upon the Consolidated Fund. It frequently happened that diplomatic officers under the Foreign Office were employed as consuls, and whenever that occurred their salaries appeared under two different heads. The embassy houses were under the direction of the Board of Works, for what precise reason he could not tell, but he supposed that arrangement was adopted with the view of securing economy.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH stated that the diplomatic expenditure, so far from having remained stationary, had been increased under every head. The present Vote, for example, had been raised since 1851 from £16,800 to £37,000. It would be far better to give our representatives abroad a fixed sum for house rent than to provide them with embassy houses. He was of opinion, moreover, that many embassies, particularly in Germany, might be suppressed with advantage; and he complained that our Minister Plenipotentiary in Prussia had been elevated to the rank of an Ambassador with a corresponding increase of salary. In these days of railways and telegraphs it was no longer necessary to maintain large diplomatic establishments in all parts of the world. At the smaller courts all we wanted was a mere chargé d'affaires instead of large and expensive diplomatic establishments. The cost of the embassy at Wurtemberg was £3,000; Saxony, £3,300; Hanover, £4,000; Bavaria, £5,000. It was high time that there should be a reduction in this expenditure. He would support the Motion for the reduction of the Vote.

MR. LAYARD thought the hon. Member was mistaken in his view as to the increase of expense on account of the embassy houses. The practice of taking these establishments for a series of years was found to contribute both to convenience and economy. He hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn, the money being required for actual expenditure.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Vote did not bear on the argument of the hon. Gentleman. It was a Vote for the contingent expenses of the different missions, which expenses were regulated by certain rules, and depended upon services performed. It did not touch salaries, but was for messengers, postages, and other things, expenses that must be incurred. The only effect of curtailing the Vote would be to deprive the department of what was required for carrying on the service of the country. The estimate in one year was founded upon the expense of the year preceding. The amount of the expenses was examined at the Foreign Office, so that no expense should be incurred that was not in accordance with some standing regulation, and for some service performed. The only result of the proposed reduction would be to prevent the service being carried on.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the only result would be that the Government would be obliged to economize and husband that sum of £180,000, and pay the expense of the diplomatic service out of it. This was the only way in which they could prevent this large increase of expenditure.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The hon. Member is entirely mistaken. We have no authority to misapply to this service money which is voted for a different purpose. That is for salaries, pensions, and allowances, and for nothing else. The Government would be acting against the law if we were to apply it for this purpose.

MR. DODSON said, he thought that the explanations of the noble Lord and the Under Secretary were most unsatisfactory. He would divide the Committee on the question, and hoped to be supported.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the only effect of curtailing the Vote would be to starve these different missions, and prevent their performing work essential to the public service.

Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 113: Majority 76.

MR. VANCE: While we are upon the subject of our embassies, I should be glad to know who conducts in this country the relations between his Holiness the Pope and the Government of Great Britain? We had a long discussion the other night on the conduct of the diplomatic relations between this country and the Papal States, and it was admitted that the responsibility of carrying on these relations at Rome was divided between Mr. Odo Russell and the Consul at Rome. We all know who protect the interests of the Pope in the House of Commons, but I wish to know who in this country conducts the relations between the Pope and the Government?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I can only answer the question which has been put to me in the negative. There is no person accredited in this country to carry on diplomatic relations between the Government and the Pope.

MR. VANCE: But there is no one accredited in Rome; and yet Mr. Odo Russell conducts the relations. Who in this country has a corresponding position?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No one that I am aware of.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he wished to ask for an explanation of the items for board wages and servants' wages at the embassies in France and Turkey. He also remarked that the Vote contained items for chapels and chaplains in France, Turkey, and Greece; but not in Russia and Spain. How was it that in a country where the Protestant religion was proscribed, no sum for Divine service was included in the Votes? When travelling abroad he found that in some places there was no Church of England. He hoped that the Roman Catholic Members of that House, who spoke so much about religious liberty and freedom of conscience, would express their disapprobation concerning the manner in which those principles were ignored in Spain.

MR. TORRENS said, he thought that some explanation was required as to the expenses of the embassy at Constantinople.

MR. LAYARD said, that the sums allowed for chapels depended upon the number of British residents in the different places. The charge at Constantinople was rather large for diplomatic services, but he believed that the expense for the year following would be decreased by nearly £2,000.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding £20,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1885, for Special Missions, Diplomatic Outfits, and Conveyance and Entertainment of Colonial Officers and others."

MR. BUTT said, he wanted to call attention to an item of £52 in connection with the mission of Commodore Wilmot to the King of Dahomey; and to express his opinion that no British officer should have consented to or sanctioned by his presence the horrible massacre which that gallant gentleman had witnessed, and which had been ordered by the King as a sacrifice to the spirit of his Majesty's father. The proceedings of Commodore Wilmot had outraged the feelings of a great number of persons in this country; and in asking Parliament to vote the money for the mission they really asked it to be a party to these barbarous practices. Thinking that Parliament should assert the principle that no prospect of gain from trade ought to have induced the representative of the Queen of England to sanction such a scene by his presence, he moved the reduction of the Vote by this sum.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £52 4s. 4d., for Seamen's Clothing supplied to Commodore Wilmot from the Rattlesnake in January, 1863, for presentation to the Chiefs, &c., at the Court of the King of Dahomey, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Butt.)

MR. LAYARD said, that Commodore Wilmot was an officer of the greatest humanity, who had devoted a great part of his life to the welfare of Africa, and had undertaken a perilous journey to Dahomey for the express purpose of getting the King to give up the slave trade, and put an end to the barbarous "customs." Unfortunately, he arrived at a time when the great annual ceremony was performed, at which human beings were sacrificed. His object was not to break with the King, but to obtain a personal influence over him; and in this Commodore Wilmot had succeeded. His (Mr. Layard's) impression was that Commodore Wilmot was not present at any of those scenes, and he would certainly have looked with horror on anything of the kind. His visit had some result, for the King released some unfortunate captives who were taken by the Commodore down to Lagos, and there had their liberty given them. Commodore Wilmot had received no remuneration in respect of this mission, and he was entitled to every praise for the courage, humanity, and devotion he had exhibited in Africa.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he had understood the hon. and learned Gentleman not to reflect on Commodore Wilmot's conduct so much as to wish to protest on the part of the House against scenes which had shocked the whole kingdom.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to refer to an item of £1,796, being the "balance of expenses of the special mission of the hon. H. G. Elliot to Greece," and another item of £1,000 for an outfit allowance to the "hon. H. G. Elliot, Her Majesty's Minister at Turin." The initials were the same, but those two items occurring in one year could hardly refer to the same person. He wished to know whether the Dromio of Athens and the Dromio of Turin were the same persons?

MR. LAYARD said, that Mr. Elliot was sent to Athens on a special mission, and was afterwards appointed to Turin. These items contained the necessary expenses, and referred to the same person.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £3,649, to complete the sum for Third Secretaries to Embassies, &c.

(5.) £123,280, to complete the sum for Superannuation and Retired Allowances.

(6.) £728, Toulon and Corsican Emigrants, &c., and American Loyalists.

(7.) £325, Refuge for the Destitute.

(8.) £1,959, to complete the sum for Polish Refugees and Distressed Spaniards.

(9.) £50,700, to complete the sum for Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions.

(10.) £25,400, to complete the sum for Relief of Distressed British Seamen.

(11.) £2,607, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charges, formerly on Civil List.

(12.) £1,272, to complete the sum for Public Infirmaries, Ireland.

(15.) £200, Coombe Lying-in Hospital.

(16.) £5,600, to complete the sum for House of Industry Hospitals.

(17.) £1,500, to complete the sum for Cork Street Fever Hospital.

(19.) £100, St. Mark's Ophthalmic Hospital.

(20.) £300, to complete the sum for Dr. Steeven's Hospital.

(21.) £245, for Board of Superintendence of Dublin Hospitals.

(22.) £5,693, to complete the sum for Concordatum Fund, and other Charities and Allowances, Ireland.

(23.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £29,670, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for Non-conforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland."

MR. HADFIELD remarked that the Vote had increased 60 per cent, although the number of the Presbyterian ministers who received it had diminished 20 per cent in the course of as many years. It was a curious fact that the only body of Nonconformist clergy who received aid from the State had diminished in number, while all other Dissenters in the United Kingdom who received no aid from the State had increased in number. He should move the reduction of the grant by the sum of £29,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £870, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for Non-conforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland."
—(Mr. Hadfield.)

MR. DAWSON said, that the Presbyterians of Ireland were not a rich body, as, except in the case of a few places, the great bulk of Presbyterians consisted of persons whose means were too limited to enable them to provide for themselves the means of religious instruction. The grant was in accordance with a compact and a practice long established, since James I. induced a number of Scotch families with their ministers to emigrate to Ireland.

MR. COX said, that from his experience, he was not of opinion that the Presbyterians of the North of Ireland were too poor to support their own clergy. He, as a member of the Church of England, always voted against church rates, because he did not think it was right to tax a Dissenter for the support of his Church. Therefore, he objected to being taxed himself for the support of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

MAJOR STUART KNOX complained that the hon. Member for Finsbury had again insulted the Presbyterians of Ireland. He wished to know from the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he had given a favourable consideration of the application for an increase of the grant?

MR. COX denied that he had insulted the Presbyterians of Ireland. He had only stated that they were a wealthy and well-to-do body.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, an application had been made for an increase of the grant, but he had not given any encouragement to the suggestion.

MR. HADFIELD remarked that more than 4,000,000 Catholics in Ireland supported their clergy without State aid.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE observed, that the Motions for withdrawing this grant from the Protestant Nonconformists in Ireland originated not with Irish, but with English Members. It was said no other class of Dissenters received an endowment from the State. The Presbyterians in Ireland, however, stood on a different footing from other Nonconformists. The three denominations in Ireland received national grants; why should not the religious body in question? He should support the Vote.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, he objected to grants of public money for the support of any man's religion. He believed the endowment, instead of doing good, was doing harm in Ireland. The Protestant Nonconformists in that country were able to support their own ministers, and he hoped the House would stand by his hon. Friend in resisting the Vote.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 21;

Original Question put, and agreed to.
House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported this day.

INLAND REVENUE (STAMP DUTIES) BILL—[BILL 159.]—CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be taken into Consideration this day."

MR. HENNESSY said, he had an Amendment to propose.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Motion is to postpone the order.

MR. HENNESSY said, he was quite aware of the fact, but being anxious to move that its consideration be postponed to that day week, he desired to give reasons in favour of that course. The Bill had been introduced on the 17th of June, and until it arrived at the stage of Committee no conversation took place in the House upon its provisions. It was introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was founded upon three Resolutions, none of which authorized a very important portion of the Bill relating to the brewing and sale of beer. He would not discuss the regularity of the mode in which it was sought to deal with a very important trade in Ireland; but he thought it very desirable that an opportunity of considering the scope of the measure should be given to that trade. On Friday last the right hon. Gentleman, in reply to a question, intimated that the Bill, so far from imposing greater penalties upon brewers in Ireland, was a relieving measure. What was the fact? Section 9 repealed a number of Irish Acts, for which others in force in England were substituted by Section 10. Among these was the 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 52, s. 54, requiring brewers to make entries of all their brewing utensils, vats, &c., under a penalty of £100. For that section the English Act, 1 Will. IV. c. 15, if substituted, would impose a penalty of £200. The 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 52, s. 50, as to the entry of quality of malt, contemplated a penalty of £100 for infringement. That was to be done away with, and the 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 22, s. 1. substituted, by which in like manner the amount of penalty would be doubled. With reference to washed malt, in the same way the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to double the present penalty. Every Irish Member present would corroborate the statement that not a brewer in Ireland could be aware of the nature of the Bill before the House. He therefore moved that its consideration be postponed to that day week.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the word "week."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'week' be there added."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not follow the irregular example of the hon. Member in discussing the details of clauses on a Motion to postpone the consideration of the Report—a very unusual Motion, he must add. The usual practice was to allow the Member in charge of a Bill to name a time, and then, if disapproved of, to object at that time to its being proceeded with. But his object in pressing the Bill was to obtain a decision of the House upon a clause which, for the convenience of hon

Members, he had delayed for some time—namely, that relating to an Act under which prosecutions for illicit distillation were conducted in Ireland. If the Report were agreed to he had no objection to postpone the third reading of the Bill, which would, in fact, be giving every opportunity for consideration. If thought desirable the recommittal of the Bill might be moved as an Amendment to the third reading. The hon. Member for the King's County was entirely wrong in the view which he had given of the effect of the Bill. He should be prepared on the next occasion to make good his statement, that the alterations introduced were in favour of the brewing trade in Ireland.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken of irregularity, but it would be found that the irregularity rested wholly with himself. There would be another opportunity of considering the grave question, whether the Resolutions adopted by the House warranted the propositions contained in the Bill; at present, all he desired to say was that the Bill had been exactly one week before the House, and from its title was not at all likely to attract the attention of the brewing trade. The right hon. Gentleman had, on the introduction of the Bill, not vouchsafed any explanation which would show to those interested in the brewing trade what the real intention of the measure was; nay, more, two or three nights ago, when explanations were asked, there was very great difficulty in getting any at all, and the explanation ultimately given was that the Bill would have no operation at all upon the brewing trade, or if it had, that it would be solely for their advantage. The Chancellor of the Exchequer shook his head, but he had heard him repeat the statement only a moment before. He had only been able to look very hastily into the Acts which were quoted in the Bill, but he undertook to say, that in one instance certainly, and he believed in a considerable number, the statement of the hon. Member for the King's County was perfectly borne out. The very first penalty dealt with in the Bill was doubled by being increased from £100 to £200. The Chancellor of the Exchequer evidently was not aware of the effect of his own Bill, or he would not have made his former statement and repeated it that evening. A cloud of statutes were dealt with in what he must call a most slovenly way, the whole English law as to brewing being extended to the Irish trade in a space of three or four lines. It was a matter which required serious consideration by the trade. Nothing had dropped from the Government to direct attention to it, and it was only that day and the day before that hon. Members had been able to send copies of the Bill to the persons whose interests it affected. He thought the postponement asked for a very fair one. On the third reading Amendments could not be moved or a particular clause struck out, if that should appear desirable, and to recommit a Bill at such an advanced period of the Session would be a perilous proceeding.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would consent if the particular clause to which he had referred were sanctioned on the following day to defer the consideration of the rest of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Power for Treasury to relinquish £4,000 a year).

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to move, at the end of the clause, a proviso to secure the payment of certain pensions due to British subjects. The pensions to which he referred were charged as an offset against the remission of £4,000 under the Bill, and his Amendment provided that the sum should not be remitted until the salaries were paid.

MR. LAYARD said, there was no practicable mode of effecting the object which the hon. Gentleman had in view. The treaty was in specific terms, and the Bill merely ratified the treaty. It was not possible to add the present proviso to the treaty, as it would be a breach of good faith.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that if the Government made an improper use of their power that House was not bound to ratify it. He hoped the Committee would be no parties to such dishonesty, and he asked them to condemn the conduct of the Government with regard to it. Those gentlemen had subscribed for years to a fund; they had served the Ionian Republic, and Her Majesty's Government were bound to guarantee these pensions.

Sir Hugh Cairns

MAJOR HAMILTON said, this country was bound to give these officers security for their pensions. The pensions were granted under a stipulation that these officers should not be employed by the English Government, and that had been carried out. He hoped the Committee would be no party to such a fraud.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not know an instance in which such liberal care had been taken of the private interests of individuals. After a short term of service they found themselves in possession of incomes which were by no means applicable to such a case in this country. Assuredly the hon. Member could not intend that the private interests of those gentlemen should be mixed up with our diplomatic engagements. Her Majesty had made an engagement with other Powers to surrender a certain sum, and that was a matter entirely distinct from the case of those pensioners. Perhaps the hon. Member would say that it was only in case of breach of faith that the proviso would come into operation; but we had no right to make that a ground for not fulfilling an engagement on our part. We had solemnly engaged to give the King of Greece £4,000 a year, and any breach of faith on the part of the Greek Parliament would not in the slightest degree relieve us from the obligation of paying this personal dotation.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, if he understood the right hon. Gentleman he asked the House to consent to a treaty, when the Crown of England was already so unconditionally pledged that if the consent of the House was refused a breach of faith would be incurred. He could not understand how any decision of that House upon a question proposed to it by the Government could be determined in one way or another by the argument of a breach of faith. With regard to the liberal provision made for those gentlemen, it might be a liberal provision if the money were paid; but if not paid it could not be called a liberal provision. If the faith of England were pledged to the payment, it would, indeed, be a liberal provision; but with the faith of Greece pledged it was quite another thing.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if the noble Lord had been in his place in the early part of the evening he would have heard a discussion of the whole question, and would have learnt that the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government was in entire accordance with precedent. Whether that was a proper course or not was a question which it was quite competent for the noble Lord to raise. Twelve months ago he explained to the House that the grant would be founded upon diplomatic arrangements which would be made on the responsibility of the executive Government, who would then appeal to the House for its approval, and that explanation was received as perfectly satisfactory. The course which had been taken was in conformity with established practice, and the effect of it undoubtedly was that the Crown had entered into an unconditional engagement. The noble Lord might make it an occasion for censure if he pleased.

MR. AYRTON said, the discussion which had just taken place would illustrate the state of things which he had endeavoured to bring under the notice of the House, when hon. Members were too absorbed in another matter to attend to anything else. The House found itself in this ridiculous position, that when anyone got up to express his opinion he was told it was most impertinent to do so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer exhibited an instance of Chinese politeness. He offered a Bill for the consideration of the House, with the clear understanding, however, that the House was not to consider it at all. That was evidently an unsatisfactory state of things, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, knowing it to be so, had said he hoped it would not occur again, and he was good enough to suggest that there were precedents—which were very bad precedents—in accordance with which the Government had acted. But if the Government had acted as it ought to have done, in fulfilment of the pledge given by the right hon. Gentleman, he would venture to affirm that the House of Commons would never have consented to pass the Bill before them without some provision by which the money to be paid to the servants of the Crown would be made an antecedent charge. But in the position in which the House was placed he believed they had no alternative but to pass the Bill, as Her Majesty had entered into a treaty by which her faith was pledged.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he would suggest that if his hon. and gallant Friend would leave out the last line of his Resolution the National Treasury would have to pay, in default of that of Greece, and there would be no occasion to make any deduction from the £4,000 a year.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he differed from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the length of time those gentlemen had served. Many of them had passed half their lives in our service. We were parties to the seizing of the fund which guaranteed their pensions, and should now take care that they did not suffer through our neglect.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he would move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Lord Robert Cecil.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 48 ; Noes 58 : Majority 10.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he would move the addition of the first part of his Proviso only, namely—

"Provided always that certain sums for pensions and compensations, payable to British subjects and others who were employed in the service of the Ionian Republic when under British protection, and guaranteed by the said treaty, shall be regularly paid."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the alteration would not remove the difficulty.

COLONEL DUNNE said that what he desired was, that the King of the Hellenes, as our pensioner, should not be paid unless he paid our pensioners.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that such a proposal would be most inequitable. The claims of these persons was not against the King of the Hellenes in his personal capacity, but against the Greek State and Government, and it was under the custody and charge of the British Government to see it satisfied. The arrangement, however, was not with the Greek Government or the Greek State, but was an arrangement for the benefit of the King of the Hellenes personally, and attached to him irrespective of the Greek State, or of his being at the head of it. If he were to cease to be King of the Hellenes, his right would remain the same, and if the Greeks were to put him out and then refuse to pay these pensioners it would be very hard that he should not receive the money.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that after what had just fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer he should recommend his hon. Friend to withdraw his proviso. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was a charge upon the Greek Government, and that it was under the custody and charge of the British Government to make the Greek Government pay it. That was a pledge from a Minister of the Crown to go to war if it was not paid. Those who were present would remember the pledge, and he thought that his hon. and gallant Friend might safely withdraw his Motion.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that he should take the advice which the noble Lord had given to him. The arrangement was for a remission of the debt to the Greek Government, and he thought that if the King was kicked out he would be very clever if he ever got his pension.

MR. HENNESSY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had rebuked the hon. Member for Stamford for not understanding the Question; he would show how little the right hon. Gentleman knew of his own Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said that the money would be paid to the King, not only during but after his reign. The words of the Bill, however, were—"It shall be lawful to pay the said sum to George I., King of Greece, during his reign."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he was speaking from recollection on the diplomatic arrangement, and his impression and belief was that the remission was intended as a personal dotation to the King individually. The words "personal dotation" were employed in the treaty, and the essence of the matter was that the dotation should be independent of his retaining the throne of Greece.

MR. AYRTON said, that the treaty made it a personal dotation, and gave it to the King for his life. Her Majesty's Government had confined it to his reign, and had put an interpretation upon the treaty which the King would not have placed upon it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it did so appear from the Bill itself, and therefore by the next stage of the Bill the error could be remedied.

MR. LONGFIELD said, then in that case the Government ought to consent to the Chairman reporting Progress. He should therefore move, That the Chairman report Progress.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LYGON asked, what course the Government intended to take to bring the Bill into harmony with the treaty?

Lord Robert Cecil

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the question was, whether or not he was right in his construction of the words "personal dotation?" The terms of the Bill as they stood were against him. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would ascertain before the next stage of the Bill came on what was the construction that ought to be placed upon these words.

Clause agreed to.

BROKERS BONDS AND RENTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.—(Lord Taunton.)

LORD KINGSDOWN moved that it be read a second time that day six months. He had no connection with either the promoters or the opponents of the Bill, and made his Motion solely on public grounds—namely, that it would perpetuate a great injustice upon the City of London, and that it ought to come before the House as a Public and not as a Private Bill: on that point, however, he was prepared to accept the decision of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees. The Bill proposed two things. The first proposal was to repeal so much of an Act of Queen Anne as required all brokers in the City of London to be admitted and sworn before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen; and the other was to repeal another Act which imposed certain securities upon brokers as the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen might from time to time think it right to adopt. His objection was mainly founded upon the fact that the Act which it proposed to repeal was an Act passed for the regulation of brokers in the City of London, with a view to the public benefit and the security of commerce within the City of London. It was a great mistake to suppose that the jurisdiction was introduced in the reign of Queen Anne, for the principle was established 600 years ago, in the time of Edward I., in whose reign an Act was passed, which Act provided that no broker should be admitted to practise unless he had been sworn in before the Lord Mayor and the Court of Aldermen. The reason for that regulation was obvious, because it prevented improper persons from exercising those privileges. Whether the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen were a good tribunal for regulating a subject of so much importance it was not necessary to consider, but whether it should be dealt with by public or private legislation. This was nothing but an attempt to deprive the City of London of an income which they purchased for a large sum of money, and which they had enjoyed for many centuries, and the only ground for depriving them of it was that the Corporation received from this source too large a sum of money. He trusted he had shown sufficient grounds for the Amendment which he proposed.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")—(Lord Kingsdown.)

LORD TAUNTON said, that the abuse against which the Bill was directed was one that loudly called for removal. It had in its favour the recommendation of the Commission appointed to inquire into the state of the Corporation of London, on which Sir George Lewis and Sir John Pattison were his colleagues, and it had been thoroughly examined by a Committee of the House of Commons and passed unanimously, and was warmly approved of by the commercial interests in the City. His noble and learned Friend had been supplied with all his arguments by the Corporation of London, who were interested parties, as it was they who benefited by the abuse. The Corporation levied the tax on the most respectable brokers, whilst whole hosts of interlopers passed scot free. Sir Robert Carden had given evidence against the present system before the Select Committee of the House of Commons, and the late Mr. Charles Pearson, the City solicitor, and an exceedingly shrewd man, had advised his clients to get the tax when they could, never to enforce it, and above all things never to raise discussion as to its merits. It appeared that the case of the Corporation having broken down before the Committee of the House of Commons, in which there were many friends of the City, they had gone round to their Lordships' House, and were at last fortunate in finding an advocate in his noble and learned Friend. A Committee of their Lordships' House might inquire whether anything in the way of a compromise might be effected, and he was sure that any suggestion coming from such a source would be received with great respect by the promoters. He believed there never had been a Bill which had undergone a more searching or scrutinising inquiry in the House of Commons, and it would be a great misfortune if the two Houses of Parliament should come to separate views upon such a subject.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had always been particularly careful to keep private legislation within its proper bounds, so that it should not interfere with public legislation; and the first thing he found in this Bill was that it is proposed to repeal a Public Act, and secondly that it sought to bring about a great measure of municipal reform by indirect means. Now, nothing would be more dangerous than to allow a municipal reform to be made by private legislation. On these grounds he thought the Bill ought to be rejected.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY hoped that their Lordships would pause before they rejected the Bill, which had been passed unanimously in the other House of Parliament, and which had passed through its several stages hitherto with the full conviction of those promoting it that it could not be objected to as a Private Bill. The promoters asked that the Bill should be considered by a Committee of this House; and it would then be competent for their Lordships, acting upon the Report of the Committee, to reject the Bill if they thought fit so to do. But he submitted that it would be an objectionable precedent to reject the measure in its present stage.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he should not object to the sending of the Bill to a Select Committee if he did not think it contained a dangerous and destructive principle. It was the most undisguised measure of confiscation ever submitted to Parliament. No good reason had been shown for taking these revenues from the corporation, to whom they had been secured by successive Sovereigns for many centuries, and the only ground for doing so was that they amounted to a considerable sum. He should therefore cordially support the Amendment.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2^a on this Day Six Months.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BROUGHAM rose to call the attention of their Lordships to the subject of which he had given notice—he meant the state of the Brazilian slave trade—and it gave him the utmost satisfaction, having so often complained of Portugal rather than Brazil for the increase of that trade, to be able to state—as he did most confidently—that that trade had entirely ceased. Would he could say of the Cuba or Spanish slave trade, as of the Brazilian slave trade, that there remained of it not a vestige! He might be excused for stating the particulars of the cessation, because he meant on these particulars, and on the clear proof that the trade had ceased, to ground a recommendation to his noble Friend opposite for the repeal of what was called the Aberdeen Act, passed in 1845. They were all of opinion at the time of the passing of that Act that it was, he would not say a most violent, but an extreme measure, and only to be justified by the absolute necessity of the case. There was a Committee of the House of Commons in 1853 moved for and presided over by Mr. Hume. That Committee collected a great mass of evidence respecting the Portuguese and Spanish slave trade, and in that Committee there was also given the most complete proof of the entire abolition of the Brazilian slave trade. It had been increasing very much in 1845. In 1842 the number of slaves imported into Brazil was 17,000. In 1846 it increased to 50,000, and in 1848 it was no less than the enormous number of 60,000. In consequence of the nature of the Brazilian coast and its numerous small bays, our squadron, notwithstanding the zealous efforts of our gallant officers, had not succeeded in extirpating the traffic; nevertheless, in 1849, the number had fallen from 60,000 to 54,000. In 1850 it fell to 23,000; in 1851 to 3,000; in 1852 to 700; and in 1853 there were absolutely none. The Emperor on all occasions showed the most determined resolution to effect the abolition of this trade, and, by the employment of additional steamers and the adoption of other regulations, he took measures both to put an end to it and to prevent its revival. In 1850 a law passed both Chambers without opposition which made the slave trade piracy and established a special court for the trial of such offences, which had a most admirable effect. The fact was that the general public feeling of Brazil was adverse to the slave trade, as was shown by the fact that at the elections for both the general Parliament and the provincial ones the successful candidates were persons who had been most active in the suppression of the trade, and the detection and punishment of offenders; and it was only supported by a few planters. The Government gave great encouragement to the immigration of free labour, and it was found that while the profits upon plantations cultivated by slaves amounted to only 8 per cent, those obtained from plantations where free labour was employed reached 14 per cent. The result was that the Committee of the House of Commons to which he had referred reported that the Brazilian slave trade had entirely ceased, and that there was no reason to apprehend its revival. The Aberdeen Act was always acknowledged to be an extreme measure, justified only by the extreme necessity of the case, and the refusal of the Brazilian Government to renew the convention which had then just expired, and Lord Aberdeen himself in his correspondence with our envoy at Rio spoke of it as only a temporary measure intended to meet a special occasion, and authorized him to assure the Government that as soon as the slave trade ceased it would be repealed. Since 1853 the slave trade with Brazil had entirely ceased, and the necessity for that Act must, therefore, have been removed. He could not, he might add, say so much for Spain as he had for Brazil. Spain had entered into a treaty with us, by which we agreed to give her a large sum of money in consideration of her abolishing her slave trade and taking actual measures for that purpose; but the only part of the stipulations of the treaty which she had performed was to receive the money, leaving undone that for which it was to be given. He was afraid, indeed, that so long as Cuba was under the Spanish Government it would be found impossible to procure the passing of good local measures for the abolition of the infernal traffic. The result of the distribution of gold by the slave dealers, and the large profits which they made by the trade, was that they were able to corrupt the Governors of Cuba who, with but few exceptions, were thus made partners in the guilt. What was once said by a Roman orator against one whose name was chiefly known in connection with that of his illustrious accuser was equally applicable to the Spanish Governors of Cuba, Nihil tam sanctum quod non violari; nihil tam munus quod non expugnari pecuniâ possit. As he had said before, the conduct of Brazil was different, and he was happy to find from a despatch of Mr. Christie, who bore no particular goodwill toward the Brazilian Government, to the noble Earl, that there was no probability of the slave trade being resumed in that quarter.

EARL RUSSELL was happy to say that the slave trade in Brazil had been abolished by law, and did not in practice exist; at the same time he could not state that in his opinion the abolition of the slave trade was entirely owing to the change in policy in Brazil, and the laws passed in that country on that subject. The Aberdeen Act was a very severe Act, and the operation of it was severe, because while the slave trade was going on and that Act was in operation, his noble Friend Lord Palmerston, then Foreign Secretary, gave orders, through the Admiralty, by which slavers were captured in the waters of Brazil. The execution of those orders gave great alarm to the slave traders in Brazil, and they soon found that it was not any longer a profitable traffic. At the same time he readily confessed, that under the policy which Brazil had adopted and followed for many years, the Aberdeen Act had become inoperative. But if any party were to come into power who should endeavour to restore the slave trade, they would have the opportunity of doing so if this Act were repealed. His noble and learned Friend said the present was a favourable time for the repeal of the Act; he (Earl Russell) did not think so. The Brazilian Government had chosen to suspend diplomatic relations with this country upon a ground that could mean nothing more than objection to the measures taken merely for the protection of the lives of British subjects in Brazil. He could not think that they were entitled under those circumstances to any great favour at the hands of this country. He regretted, with his noble and learned Friend, the continuance of the slave trade in Cuba.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that if his noble Friend would read the evidence taken by the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1853, he would be convinced that no squadron on the coast of Brazil could ever put an end to the slave trade. He ought to have mentioned that the conduct of the Brazilians to the free negroes was an example to our kinsmen in America.

LORD HOUGHTON said, if the Brazilian Government were so anxious to get rid of the Aberdeen Act, they ought to make some arrangement, as the Portuguese had, for the establishment of Mixed Courts. They had always refused to do that, and had insisted on standing on their extreme right. It was true that the slave trade to Brazil had lapsed—[Lord BROUGHAM: Ceased altogether]—but it was quite as much owing to the Brazilians finding it to be their interest to drop it as from any other cause. He could hardly understand his noble and learned Friend's laudation of a Government which had persisted more absolutely than any other Government in refusing any approximation to a measure of emancipation of their slaves. Something was due to Mr. Christie for the persistent manner in which he had done everything in his power to improve the condition of the liberated Africans, and to induce the Brazilian Government to take some steps towards emancipation, and his perseverance in this line of conduct had gained him no little illwill there.

LORD FORTESCUE believed that Mr. Christie's conduct during his mission had obtained the approbation of two successive Secretaries of State, and he did not see any reason for introducing his name into the debate.

LORD BROUGHAM denied that he had introduced Mr. Christie's name unnecessarily into the debate—he had quoted Mr. Christie as the very best evidence of the discontinuance of the slave trade, and the impossibility of its revival. He had not a word to say against Mr. Christie. Quite the contrary.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till to-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Bleaching and Dyeing Works Acts Extension; Election Petitions Act (1848) Amendment.

Select Committee—Weighing of Grain (Port of London)* [Bill 172] nominated.

Committee—Lunacy (Scotland) [Bill 146]; Administration of Trusts (Scotland) [Bill 95]; Elections Petitions [Bill 17] (count out); Thames Conservancy (re-committed) [Bill 135].
Report—Lunacy (Scotland) [Bill 146]; Administration of Trusts (Scotland) [Bill 95].

THAMES CONSERVANCY (re-committed)

BILL—[Bill 135.]—COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 69 agreed to with verbal Amendments.

Clause 70 (Power to take Tolls for Moorings and for Lighters and Steam Tugs).

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that by this clause the conservators had power to levy a tariff and dues on all vessels from a boat up to a ship of the largest size. He objected to the lighters and steam tugs being made liable to a tax of this kind; and he therefore begged to move the omission of the words "lighters and steam tugs used on the river Thames."

MR. HUTT said, he could not agree to the Amendment. The subject had been carefully considered by the Committee, and they determined that the clause should remain as it at present stood. The Committee appointed last year to inquire into the subject of the navigation of the Thames said, that no craft were more indebted to the labours of the conservators than the barges and lighters, and this clause had been introduced at the suggestion of the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 71 to 74.

Clause 75 (Prohibitions of deepening or altering Sewers or Drains discharging into the River).

MR. ALCOCK moved to insert proviso—

"Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed to apply to any legally authorized sewers, drains, or works, now in course of construction by the Local Board of Health for the district of Kingston-upon-Thames, and the connection of the houses in such district with the said sewers, drains, and works."

Amendment proposed,

In page 25, line 4, after the word "condition," to insert the words "Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to apply to any legally authorized sewers, drains, or works, now in course of construction by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Kingston-upon-Thames, and the connection of the houses in such borough with the said sewers, drains, and works."—(Mr. Alcock.)

MR. HUTT said, he had promised to agree to the Amendment, because it had been urged that the operation of the measure would act very unfairly upon the district, but he could not but confess he had done so with regret.

MR. LOCKE said, he must resist the insertion of the proviso, because he regarded it as legalizing a nuisance. It was of little use to attempt the cleansing of that part of the Thames which ran through London, if towns above the metropolis were to be permitted to empty their filth into the river. If he went into the lobby alone, he would vote against the insertion of the proviso.

MR. LOCKE KING reminded the House that when the Bill was introduced the clause before the House was not in it. He thought such a clause ought not to be placed in a Thames Conservancy Bill, but ought to be embodied in a general Act dealing with the drainage of the towns upon the Thames. There was nothing in the preamble which warranted the insertion of the clause.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that as the Bill was one to protect the Thames from pollution, this clause was a reasonable one, and the insertion of a proviso which would have the effect of sanctioning the creation of a nuisance at Kingston-on-Thames was not at all justifiable. He should go into the lobby with the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke).

MR. LOCKE reminded the House that the Bill allowed Kingston-upon-Thames to go on with its present pollution of the Thames, and only enacted that no increased sewage was to be discharged into the river. He thought the proposition was a monstrous one, and not founded in justice or right.

MR. HEADLAM thought that sewers legally in course of construction should share in the same exemptions as those already made, however objectionable the discharge of sewage into the river might be.

MR. DOULTON said, the adoption of this Amendment would entirely upset all their past legislation in reference to the Thames.

MR. ALCOCK thought it would be a good thing if all the towns on the Thames were forbidden to make use of the river for the purposes of sewage; but it was unfair to come upon Kingston-on-Thames so suddenly when they had just entered into a contract which would cost them £10,000.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

LUNACY (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 146.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he objected to going on with this Bill at all. He did not think the Lord Advocate could have taken any course more calculated to prove the truth of what has been said, that the business of Scotland was conducted in this House in a most unsatisfactory manner. The Bill was first introduced in the middle of June, they were now in Committee upon it on the 28th; and neither upon the first nor the second reading, nor upon the present stage of the Bill, had there been any explanation given of the necessity of introducing it at all. The Bill itself was a very short and a very unpretending Bill, and might have been introduced at the commencement of the Session if the Lord Advocate had been attending to the Scotch business as sedulously as he had represented himself to have done. The Bill purported to amend an Act passed about two years ago. The Bill then passed was a sort of continuance Bill. The Lunacy Commission in Scotland was constituted about the year 1857; it was to expire in five years; so that in 1862 it became necessary to introduce a Bill to continue it. The Board consisted of an unpaid chairman and of the Commissioners—medical men—with salaries of £1,200 a year each, and the Secretary of State had power to appoint two Deputy Commissioners of Lunacy at salaries of £500 a year each; there was a secretary with a salary of £300 a year, and a clerk with a salary of £150 a year. This was the Board; but it really consisted of the two medical gentlemen and the unpaid chairman. The Board, so constituted in 1857, soon made itself peculiarly obnoxious. They were armed with large powers, and they speedily came into collision with almost all the parochial boards in Scotland. Their proceedings were very unpopular; but there was no escape from them. If any person objected to the proceedings of any particular Commissioner, he might appeal to the Board; but inasmuch as the Board consisted only of that Commissioner and another, and of the chairman, they confirmed each other's proceedings. Therefore, when in 1862 a Bill was brought in to continue this Lunacy Board, considerable opposition was made to it by the parochial authorities in Scotland, and who, with that view, sent up deputations to London. The main objections to the measure were directed against the powers of the Commission and its constitution; but ultimately the Bill passed. One clause was, however, inserted in the Bill, to the effect that the Deputy Commissioners appointed by the Secretary of State should continue in office only until 1864. Now, what was the object of that clause? The object was to enable the Lord Advocate, during the two years that the Bill was to continue in force, to see whether a Board might not be constituted in a different and less objectionable form to the people of Scotland than the existing Board. The present Bill proposes to continue in office, two gentlemen with a salary of £500 a year each, whose term of office would have expired in August of the present year. The Bill ought to have amended the constitution of the Lunacy Board. It should have been re-constituted in some manner less objectionable to the people of Scotland; and it ought to have been introduced at the beginning of the Session, so that it might have been considered by the county meetings on the 30th April. But, instead of this, the Bill was introduced in the middle of June. It was on the face of it a very unpretending and simple Bill. It consisted, indeed, of only two clauses and the preamble, and the first clause enacts that

"The provisions of the first recited Act in regard to the appointment of Deputy Commissioners shall be and are hereby continued until Parliament shall otherwise determine."

That was to say, that the two Commissioners whose power was limited to August 1864, in order that the matter should this Session be re-considered, are to be made permanent until Parliament shall otherwise determine. That is one way of redeeming the pledge under which these Commissioners were appointed until August 1864. The second clause is another very strange performance. It provides that these two Deputy Commissioners, who are now to be continued until Parliament shall otherwise determine—or, in other words, until the Lord Advocate shall determine, because Scotch business in Parliament is in the hands of the Lord Advocate for the time being. That was the way in which the pledge given two years ago—that the subject should be re-considered with a view to reconstituting the Lunacy Board—had been redeemed. Such was always the way in which Scotch business is managed in this House. He had already stated his opinion that Scotch business was conducted in a very unsatisfactory manner, and he thought the way in which this Bill had been conducted was a proof of that assertion. He had made these observations with a view of giving the Lord Advocate an opportunity of making what statements he might think fit on the Bill; but he gave him notice that, if this was the way in which Scotch business was to be conducted in future, he must expect to meet with very considerable opposition.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he agreed very much with what had fallen from his hon. Friend (Mr. Smollett), and particularly as to the prevalence of a feeling in Scotland against the continuance of the Lunacy Board as at present constituted. When, however, the objections to the Bill were made known to the Lord Advocate, his hon. and learned Friend had frankly promised that the Bill should really be a continuance Bill for two years, so as to allow time for the consideration of the question. With that understanding, he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Smollett) would allow the Bill to pass, in order that, before the two years should have expired, there might be an opportunity of considering the footing on which the Board should continue. He must say that though the existence of such superintending Boards was looked upon with great jealousy by many persons in Scotland, yet he was not one of those who thought that parishes should be left to deal with their own lunatics in the way which they think best; for although there might have been many matters in the Report of the Royal Commissioners on this subject some years ago, yet the fact could not be denied that the manner in which the custody of lunatics was carried on in Scotland was a disgrace to the country. He should much fear that matters would relapse into their former state if there were not in Edinburgh authorities empowered to see that the custody and treatment of lunatics were consistent with the civilization of the age. He did not think it would be practicable to keep lunatics in private houses; and it must be evident that an authority must exist to see that these unfortunate persons are kept with due care, and in a proper manner. How this superintendence should be provided for was a matter for future consideration.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that this was a mere continuance Bill. He would not on this occasion dilate on the general management of Scotch business in this House, but he entirely denied that there was any ground for the general complaint which the hon. Member for Dumbarton had made in regard to it. He thought it would have been much better if, instead of making large criticisms upon the outside fringes of this question, he had applied himself to consider whether, during the time the Lunacy Board had been in operation, there had not been a very marked and beneficent change produced in the management of lunatics throughout the country. He was far from saying that the present machinery was perfect; but he was satisfied that no one who had taken an interest in the question would deny that they had set on foot an improved system for the treatment of lunatics which, although it might be susceptible of improvement, had put an end to a state of things which the hon. Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson) had justly said was a scandal to any civilized country. There was a good deal still to do; but much had been done. The fact was, that the Board had not powers enough under the first Act, and they were therefore extended under the second Act. It was quite true that parochial boards made their representations, and that they came up in a joint body to protest against the two medical members of the Board; but he (the Lord Advocate) was not at all prepared to say that he altogether agreed with those representations; neither did he think that the opinions of such Boards

—who are to be superintended, checked, and controlled in the management of lunatics by the authorities—are to rule in this matter; but at that time I was perfectly willing to consider the propositions they made to provide for a paid chairman and two paid lay members of the Board by parochial assessment made by the parochial boards themselves. In the end all parties were satisfied that the project was impracticable. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of pledges. Now, he (the Lord Advocate) begged to say, in the first place, that two years ago he came under no obligation whatever; and, in the second place, that, although this Bill, as far as the continuance of the Deputy Commissioners was concerned, was limited to two years, he came under no obligation to adopt at a future time any particular course in regard to the constitution of the Board. In regard to the hon. Gentleman's opposition, he hoped he would not persevere in it, for this reason—that, if the Deputy Commissioners should cease to exist, the whole machinery of the Lunacy Board would come to an end. He (the Lord Advocate) thought the continuance of the Commission absolutely necessary. In regard to the increase of salaries, there was a proposition to increase the salary of the chief clerk. That he believed to be a useful addition. In regard to the Deputy Commissioners, he did not think it could be fairly said that £600 a year was over pay, considering that the whole of their time was spent in visiting lunatic asylums throughout the country, and that they had thrown upon their shoulders very heavy and grave responsibilities. It was a position in which they ought to have—and, indeed, he was happy to say they had—medical science and ability of the first class. But the fact that they had been able to obtain first-class medical ability at £500 a year was no reason why the proposed addition should not be made. Under these circumstances, he hoped the Bill would be allowed to proceed.

MR. BAXTER hoped the hon. Member for Dumbarton would not persevere in his opposition. He thought that the proposition was quite fair, and that the present system should be continued for two years, and probably in the course of that time either his hon. Friend, or some other person, would be prepared to submit to the Lord Advocate some plan for the re-construction of this Board, if any re-construction should be deemed necessary.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he would not persevere with his Motion; but he thought the statement of the learned Lord ought to have been made on the introduction of the Bill or on its second reading.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Continuance of Deputy Commissioners).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to omit the words, "until Parliament shall otherwise determine," and to insert the words, "until the 1st August, 1866."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

MR. LESLIE said, after the explanation of the Lord Advocate, he would not proceed with the Amendments of which he had given notice.

Clause 2 (Treasury to regulate Salaries of Secretary, Clerk, and Deputy Commissioners).

MR. CAIRD desired to ask the Lord Advocate whether the duties of the officials, to whom it is proposed to give an increased allowance, have been augmented; and whether it is on that ground that the increased allowance is to be made?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in answer to the question of his hon. Friend, begged to say that this Board was originally fixed on a low scale of remuneration. Of late years the annual expenses of the office had increased, and he thought the additional allowance now proposed was in every respect just and reasonable.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that as some surprise might possibly be expressed in Scotland at the increased allowance which it was proposed to give, it might be well that it should be clearly understood that it was given on the grounds stated by the Lord Advocate. They had now on the Board gentlemen of the highest position in their profession, and it was desirable to retain them, for if they were to have such a Board, it should be composed of the best men, and of those in whom the public have confidence. The chairman of the Board is Sir John Don Wauchope, and, although he was unpaid, his office was by no means a sinecure. He had done an immense deal of service; and if the Board was to be continued with such a man at the head of it, he ought to be paid. If the Board was to be settled on a permanent footing, he could not understand why public services of the most valuable character should be performed without any remuneration; and if no provision for that was made in this Bill, it ought to be understood that it was not because Sir John Don Wauchope's services were not appreciated.

THE LORD ADVOCATE wished to add his testimony to the zeal and ability with which Sir John Don Wauchope had performed his duties.

[BILL 95.] COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 7 agreed to.

Clause 8 (Trustees desirous of purchasing the Trust Estate may apply to the Court for permission).

MAJOR HAMILTON said, he did not think they ought to pass this clause in silence. It allowed trustees and guardians of wards to acquire the property of these wards themselves, and with the leave of the Court of Session. It might happen that trustees or guardians of wards, in acquiring their property even with the consent of the Court, might do so for a fraudulent reason. He did not mean to insinuate that this would be the case, but he thought that some explanation of the clause was desirable.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, this power was to be granted simply upon an application to the Court. He thought that there ought to be some protection, that it ought to be done in the most public manner, because everything ought to be done to prevent collusion on the part of the persons interested. He quite agreed that this was a very questionable power to be given, and one which ought to be guarded in every way possible.

MR. CAIRD also objected to the clause, and hoped the Lord Advocate would be able to give them some reason why it was proposed. It did not appear to him that there was any good reason for introducing such a novel principle as that of giving powers to trustees to become themselves purchasers of the trusts which they had been appointed to administer.

Sir James Fergusson

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that no doubt this power ought to be watchfully exercised. He thought, however, that the cases in which it would be most generally exercised were family trusts, and where the trustees were generally interested in the property. Very often a much greater price could be obtained from a person who was a trustee. Sometimes the only man who cared to purchase was a trustee, and it would be often far the best arrangement which could be made. He believed that a power of this kind could be exercised on application to the Court of Chancery; and it was intended to give the Court of Session the same power. The general rule that no trustee should become the purchaser of a trust had been found to cause great inconvenience and embarrassment in many cases, and he thought there was a general impression that this power ought to be given. As far as he was aware, he thought it would be of great advantage.

MR. CAIRD said, the question was whether this power might not be used for an improper purpose, and he thought some clauses should be inserted providing that property which it was proposed to deal with in this way should be offered for public sale, so that the public would come in as a check. There might be advantage in giving the power which it was now proposed to give, but it should be so guarded that the trustees should not be able to take any advantage of the trust.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that he knew that great jealousy existed with regard to this clause as it originally stood. At that time, there was no provision that the sanction of the Court should be necessary; and he did not think it would have been possible to agree to it as it then stood. The Committee would remember how jealously the Court of Session guarded the rights of wards, and he did not think there was any reason to fear that the Court of Session would not very carefully exercise the right which it was now proposed to intrust to them. Some cases had come within his own knowledge in which it would have been advantageous if trustees could have exercised this power; and, as it would be exercised under the authority of the Court of Session, he thought no fear need be entertained.

MR. BUCHANAN said, that if he were not misinformed, the practice had been, at judicial sales by the Court of Session, to offer the property by public auction.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the object of the clause was merely to authorize the purchase of property by trustees. It did not interfere with the power of the Court of Session in regard to selling. He had no doubt that in ordinary cases the Court would not consent to a sale except by public auction; but he was quite willing to consider whether the clause could not be amended in any way before the Report came on.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Court may authorize Trustee to enter into Transactions with the Estate).

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he thought this clause ought not to be passed even in its amended state. It authorized a trustee to hold an office of profit under the trust. He knew that legal authorities in Scotland of the highest kind—including the late Lord Justice General—entertained decided feelings against such a proceeding. There were decided objections to a professional gentleman being a paid trustee; and, without any imputation, he did not think that was a position in which they ought to be placed.

COLONEL SYKES thought it was a dangerous conjunction to have an agent and trustee combined in the same person.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that formerly there was no such rule as that which now existed, and it was a very ordinary thing for the family agent to be made a trustee. It was considered that it would be of great advantage to have his knowledge and experience. Now, however, the family agent could not be appointed a trustee, without surrendering the agency of the trust. That has been found very inconvenient. He agreed that the general rule was a salutary and wholesome one; but there were many cases in which it would be extremely convenient to have the benefit of the knowledge and experience of the family agent as a member of the trust.

MR. FINLAY suggested that the clause should be postponed till the Report.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that as there seemed to be considerable difference of opinion, he would have no objection to postpone the clause till the Report.

Clause withdrawn.

Clause 10 (Extension of the Powers of Trustees in relation to Investments).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, the clause gave a very considerable extension of the powers of trustees, and enabled them to invest not only in Parliamentary and East India stock, but in the railway debentures of any railway company paying a dividend. He thought it was a question whether such a power should be exercised without the authority of the Court.

MR. BUCHANAN said, the same objection had occurred to him, but he had been given to understand that the wording of the clause was borrowed from the English Act—the 24 & 25 Vict.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Then, on Motion of The Lord Advocate, New Clauses added.

COLONIAL GOVERNORS.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose to move for an Address for a copy of any Correspondence which had passed between any Departments of the Government with respect to the granting pensions to Colonial Governors. Having on a former occasion had the honour of addressing the House on this question, which was of very great importance to a large class of public servants, he would not trouble the House at any length; but before the close of the Session, and after the answers which had been given by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, he believed the House would consider him justified in pressing the Government for a distinct understanding of their intentions on the subject. He would recal to the House one fact, and that was, that the only class of public servants who were precluded from receiving pensions or superannuation allowances for long services were the Colonial Governors. Their omission from the benefit of the Act of 1859 had been attributed to one of two causes. Either there were most important reasons for their exclusion, or else it had been an oversight, and, on the whole, he was inclined to believe in the latter solution. Three or four reasons had been given why those Governors should not be placed in the same position as other public servants. It was said they were not continuously in the service of the public; but he would ask the House if the service of our diplomatists and other public officers was continuous? Why, the very service of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not a continuous service. He (Mr. Cochrane) did not know, indeed, how long it might continue, but it was not continuous. There were hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite Bench, and also on his own side of the House, who were entitled to pensions. It was also said there would be inducements to retain officers after they became unfitted for service merely with a view of securing their pensions; but he did not see that Colonial Governors were liable to such a charge in an exceptional manner, and did not believe any weight attached to the suggestion. The third objection was that it would open the door to the bestowal of pensions upon a new class of public servants. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer could point out any other class of public servants who were in the same position and who did not receive retiring pensions, he would concede to him the whole argument. When they considered the position of the Governors of colonies, the importance of the station they held in the colonies, and the fact that they were frequently very distinguished public servants, it must be admitted that it was unjust to bring them home from stations where they represented the dignity and honour of the Crown, and to leave them in this country without, it might be, the means of subsistence. It might be said that a Colonial Governor was not the servant of the Crown, but of the colony. He did not believe, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would maintain this assertion. The Governor was often the only direct servant of the Crown in a colony, except the officers in command of the troops. The Judges and other gentlemen holding situations in the colonies were, on the other hand, colonial servants, and in many of the colonies they were in the receipt of superannuation allowances. The Governor was, however, the direct servant of the Crown. He was appointed by the Crown, and could be recalled only at the will of the Crown, and he had no one to look to but the Crown for justice and support. The Governor was, indeed, so directly the servant of the Crown that he might occasionally be called upon to take a course opposed to the wishes or interests of the colony. If the colony desired to carry out a policy objectionable to the Home Government, the Governor was compelled to follow the instructions from home. A Correspondence had been laid on the table from which it appeared that the opinion of the Duke of Newcastle, Mr. Labouchere, and all the other Colonial Secretaries, had been favourable to the granting of pensions to Colonial Governors. It also appeared that the only opposition proceeded from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was very hard, when the opinion of all those interested in the colonial service was one way, that the single opinion of the right hon. Gentleman should prevail against those of the Secretaries of the Colonies. It was not a matter of generosity, but of justice. The salaries of the Governors had been greatly reduced of late years. He believed the reduction was nearly one-half, and their salaries were not large enough to enable these gentlemen to insure their lives or to save money enough to live upon in their old age. Mr. Merivale, a great authority in that House, in his admirable work on Colonization, said that the functions of a Governor of a colony were particularly difficult and arduous. He often formed the only political link between the colony and the Home Government. To execute well the double functions that devolved upon his office demanded a man of no common ability. The occasion usually called forth those abilities, for England, Mr. Merivale added, was in no public department better served than by the higher class of her Colonial Governors. He contended that it was a monstrous thing that these gentlemen who discharged their high duties, according to Mr. Merivale, in this satisfactory manner, should, after thirty or forty years' public service, be declared undeserving of retiring pensions. Without troubling the House at greater length he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give the subject a fair and impartial consideration. It was not a mere question of economy. No one would contend that, for the sake of saving a sum which would not exceed a few thousands a year, these gentlemen should give the best years of their lives to the service of the public without the prospect of a retiring pension. He would conclude by simply moving the Address.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Copy of any Correspondence which has passed between any Departments of the Government, with respect to the granting of Pensions to Colonial Governors."—(Mr. Baillie Cochrane.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was unable to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for the correspondence with regard to granting pensions to Colonial Governors, and for reasons which the hon. Member would admit were to a certain extent satisfactory. It was not necessary nor desirable that he should follow his hon. Friend in the argument he had used in favour of granting these pensions; but he might state that he agreed with him that the subject should not be considered simply as a question of money, because it involved very grave considerations of a public character. The reason for not producing the Correspondence was this:—It was the desire of the Government to give the subject that full and impartial consideration for which his hon. Friend had asked. Of course it would be understood that he spoke without prejudice to the judgment at which they might arrive, but he could readily give the assurance for which his hon. Friend seemed most anxious, namely, that this subject would not be looked at as a simple question between the Colonial Office and the Treasury, in which the Colonial Office had a natural leaning towards the interests of its own servants, and the Treasury had a natural leaning towards the interests of the Exchequer. The Government would consider the case as a whole, and with all the matters bearing upon it. His hon. Friend would, therefore, see why they could not produce the Correspondence, which he might add was incomplete. He could not say that he regarded the question from exactly the same point of view as the hon. Gentleman. The Duke of Newcastle had submitted his views to the Treasury, but the state of the Duke's health had been the cause of some little delay. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell) had taken the matter into consideration, and had addressed two communications to the Treasury, the latter of which he had not yet seen. When his hon. Friend said that the Colonial Governors were the only public servants who were not in the enjoyment of pensions, it should be observed how very broad was the distinction between the two cases. The Colonial Governors were not for the most part paid out of the British revenues, but out of the revenues of the colonies, and, indeed, many of those who were disposed to advocate the system of pensions for those Governors considered it as part of a larger measure—namely, that of paying their salaries in all cases out of the Imperial revenues. He did not deny that there was much to be said in favour of that view, but it was not the view of Parliament, for the tendency of late years had been to reduce as rapidly as they could all payments connected with the Colonial Governments. However, he would give the assurance which his hon. Friend had asked, that during the recess every effort should be employed on the part of the Government to prosecute an inquiry into the matter to a satisfactory conclusion, and that whatever decision might be arrived at should be arrived at when they were in possession of all the facts of the case. He trusted, therefore, his hon. Friend would not press his Motion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that there were political considerations of very grave importance involved in the question, but he thought that those considerations pointed very decidedly to the policy of holding out fair inducements to men of ability to enter the service of the Crown as Governors of the colonies. Those considerations pointed to the reasonableness of the conclusion, that when the best years of a man's life had been devoted to the performance of duties of so important a character he should not find himself on his return to the country without that compensation which the other servants of the Crown obtained. Entertaining those opinions, he thought that, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, his hon. Friend would do well not to press his Motion to a division. Though he could wish that the language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been more encouraging, still he understood him to have given a pledge that during the recess the question should receive ample consideration. They had some reason to complain that it had not received consideration earlier. He had hoped that a decision upon it would have been come to during the present Session. But now that they had a distinct promise that that interesting subject should receive the serious attention of the Government, he earnestly hoped it would meet with a favourable consideration at their hands.

MR. MALINS said, he was happy to hear that the question should receive the careful consideration of the Government, which in this case, he presumed, meant the careful consideration of his right hon. Friend himself, for, as he understood, there was no other Member of the Government who had any doubt upon the propriety of making the allowances. The speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies on the last occasion was most encouraging to the hopes of the Governors. When it was admitted that they were the only class of public servants who had no retiring allowances, when it was considered that they were at once the direct representatives of Her Majesty in our colonies, and exercised the most important functions, and that many of them, after long years of service, were reduced to live in obscurity and penury, as he knew well, the question arose upon what grounds this anomaly could be sustained. None could be alleged except in regard to the public purse. But on the highest grounds of policy it was essential that men who had filled such important positions should be provided for on their retirement. It had been stated that Colonial Governors were frequently paid out of the colonial revenues. The very utmost that would be required for the purpose would be £10,000 or £12,000 a year. Civil and military officers and Ministers of the Crown all received pensions, and why should the Governors of our colonies be the only exception?

MR. CARDWELL said, he only wished to repeat now the pledge which he had given before, and which had been redeemed as far as time had allowed. Her Majesty's Government had carefully considered the subject, it was still being considered, and, he would add, would receive their best consideration.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS).

RESOLUTION.

MR. DOULTON, in moving a Resolution on the necessity of preserving open spaces in and around the metropolis, said, few questions were more interesting to the mass of the industrial population, not only to those in the metropolis itself but to those residing in the suburban districts which were fast becoming connected with the metropolis. The importance, and he would say the absolute necessity, of preserving open spaces for the recreation of the people would not be denied by any one; but, in order to prove it, he would call attention to some very striking facts connected with the large increase of population in the metropolis. In 1851 the population of what was termed the metropolitan district was 4,700,000; in 1861 it was not less than 5,600,000, or an increase of 900,000 in the short space of ten years. In the same period there was an increase in the number of houses to the amount of 103,000; that increase was still going on, and he questioned whether at any time during the ten years it advanced at a greater ratio than at this moment. But the important point was this—that while the necessity for open spaces was increasing, the difficulties of obtaining control over them were increasing also. That was not the first time that the question had been brought forward, though not in the same form as that in which he submitted it to the House that evening. But whenever it had been considered, whether in reference to Hampstead Heath, or to the places to which the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Peacocke) had called attention, there had been almost an unanimous expression of opinion in favour of the preservation of those spaces. A very few years ago London might be said to have been belted with these natural parks. Many of the commons on the south and north sides of London had become entirely extinguished, being appropriated for building purposes; and others were in process of extinction. In dealing with this matter there were two questions—the question of the forests and that of the commons and open spaces in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, and those questions ought to be kept distinct. The question of forests had already been dealt with by Parliament, which had decidedly expressed its opinion by addressing the Crown, praying that the forestal rights of the Crown might be preserved. Subsequently a Committee was appointed, which reported that it was absolutely necessary, for purposes of recreation, to preserve these forests. The Government, however, had taken no action in reference to the matter until within the last few days, when a communication was sent to the Metropolitan Board of Works by the Secretary to the Treasury, asking that Board whether they were prepared to purchase the rights over Epping Forest, with an ultimate view to the cession of the rights of the Crown. He would presently show that the Metropolitan Board of Works had no power to deal with the matter, but, if they had, there was no necessity for throwing that duty on them. The commons rested on a different tenure, for the rights over them belonged, not to the Crown, but to the lords of the manors, the copyholders, and the commoners. With respect to the inclosure of commons, application was generally made to Parliament through the Copyhold Commission, but there were some startling exceptions to that rule, and Wandsworth Common, one of the largest and best on the south side of the metropolis, was being appropriated for building purposes, though no application to inclose it had been made to the Copyhold Commissioners, and, consequently, the case had never come before Parliament. Therefore, the fact that lords of manors were able to inclose commons showed the necessity of Parliament to deal with the question. The Secretary to the Treasury had suggested, in a letter, that the Metropolitan Board of Works should take up the matter; but, as he had already intimated, it was neither in their power nor was it their duty to do so. The best proof that it did not possess the power was that whenever it had considered it desirable to carry out the construction or formation of any park it had been under the necessity of applying to Parliament for powers for that express purpose. It was true that the Act of Parliament constituting the Board authorized them to form Public Parks by purchasing land by agreement, but nobody who knew the nature of the negotiations for the purchase of land would dream of the Board forming a park in the neighbourhood of London, unless they had such compulsory powers as they did not possess. The Metropolitan Board of Works were told to maintain Epping Forest for the purpose of public recreation, but, as that was beyond their jurisdiction, the forest must be preserved at the expense, if the Board determined to undertake the task, of the inhabitants of the metropolitan districts; and the inhabitants of the neighbourhood of the forest beyond the jurisdiction of the Board, while enjoying great benefit from the preservation of the forest, would not contribute one farthing towards the expense. He would also take the cases of Mitcham and Wimbledon Commons, and he asked what would be the result if the Metropolitan Board of Works undertook to preserve them as places of public recreation. With regard to Mitcham Common, the inhabitants of the healthy and increasing town of Croydon would derive great part of the benefit, and would not contribute in any degree to the expense. So with regard to Wimbledon Common, the inhabitants of Richmond and other large towns would receive great advantage from the common being preserved, but would not be called on to pay one farthing. The Metropolitan Board of Works had already incurred liabilities for improvements to the extent of between £8,000,000 and £9,000,000. That very large expenditure was to be defrayed by the metropolitan ratepayers, and it was impossible to go on imposing fresh rates on the metropolis, the Metropolitan Board having no other means of raising funds except by direct taxation. If that Board were to be called on to preserve these open spaces—a duty which he thought more properly belonged to the Government—the House ought not to be so chary in giving the Board the same powers to tax the metropolis as were exercised in provincial towns. In bringing the question forward, he did not wish it to be understood that he was desirous that these open spaces should be transformed into neatly trimmed and laid out gardens and parks. His object was to have them preserved in all their wild and uncultivated condition, and it would be a pleasant sight to see the boisterous enjoyment of the working people in places where there did not exist those restrictions which were natural and proper enough in well laid-out gardens. He did not wish that the money for this purpose should be taken out of the Consolidated Fund, but he asked the Government to introduce a Bill giving the necessary taxing powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works to carry out the object. He concluded by moving the following Resolution:—

Moved,

“That it is the duty of Her Majesty’s Government to provide for the preservation of open spaces in and around the Metropolis within the limits assigned by the 14th section of the Inclosure Act of 1845.”—(Mr. Doultton.)

Motion made, and Question proposed.

MR. PEEL said, it would be a cause of much regret if none of the open spaces around, and, more especially, those in the metropolis, should be preserved; and he owned that it was the duty of the Government, more particularly in those cases where the intentions of Parliament had been expressed, to attend to those things. In an ordinary case, where there was an open space in which different persons had an interest, as commoners, tenants, or lords of the manor, the inclosure of such land, if it was within a certain radius of the metropolis, could not be effected without an Act of Parliament. On such an application being made, therefore, Parliament could either refuse it or grant it under certain conditions, as, for instance, with regard to the reservation of so much ground for the recreation and health of the public. When an inclosure was recently authorized in Chigwell parish, fifty acres were allotted for the use of the public. It was a mistake to suppose that there had been any very considerable diminution in the open spaces in and around the metropolis. It was nearly twenty years since the Act in regard to inclosures within the metropolitan radius of fifteen miles was passed, and during that time not more than about 1,500 acres had been inclosed, the greater part of which was upwards of ten miles from town. On the part of the Crown there had certainly been no disposition to deprive the inhabitants of London of any rights to which they were fairly entitled in that respect. He was willing to admit that in the administration of Crown property regard should be had to the effect of open ground on the public health, even in preference to the benefit which the public might otherwise derive from the disposal of the land. In Epping Forest the Government did not feel at liberty to convert the Crown's forestal rights of sporting and hunting as an instrument for virtually depriving individuals of their property. As a proof of the anxiety of the Government to give due consideration to the claims of the public in regard to open spaces, he might refer to the parks of London, and especially to the new ones, Victoria and Battersea, which had in recent years been added to the number. With respect to the commons, which were the property of private persons, it was not the duty of the Government, and it would be quite impossible for them, to deprive the owners of the right to use the ground in the same manner as other owners of private property were entitled to do. At any rate, it could not be done without giving compensation to the owners, many of whom, moreover, having only a limited interest, could not sell if they wished. The Government would also require to be armed with special powers for the purpose. The chief, and crowning difficulty, however, was the source from which the expense of preserving the open spaces should be derived. He could not admit that it was the duty of the Government to provide the means out of the public purse. There ought to be no difference in that respect between the metropolis and the other large towns of the country. As to the suggestion that further powers should be given to the Metropolitan Board of Works, it would receive the consideration of the Government. As to the Resolution he did not see how it would advance the object the hon. Member had in view, and he could not agree to it on the part of the Government.

Mr. LOCKE said, he could not agree that the Government had carefully guarded the rights of the public with regard to Epping Forest, because a number of houses had been built, and gardens and grounds attached to them, upon and from land taken from the forest, and over which the public previously had a right to roam. Therefore, he said, the Government had not sufficiently performed their duty. The object of the Motion was to make the Government more careful for the future. There might be some difficulty in providing parks and open spaces in the metropolis—from what source the necessary funds should be furnished for the purchase of the land and for compensation to those whose property was interfered with; but he did not think there was any analogy between the metropolis and large towns in the provinces, because the metropolis was spread over a vast space, and comprised within a certain area between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 of inhabitants; besides, the whole country had an interest in the capital, to which all were from time to time attracted either for business or pleasure. For these reasons it was most essential that its health and ornament should be provided for by the nation. Parliament was in the constant habit of legislating specially with respect to improvements in the metropolis; and that was a further reason why a portion of the funds should be furnished by that House. From time to time there had been encroachments round about the metropolis, which could not occur in Dublin, for instance, where the people had the Phoenix Park, and could get into the country almost immediately. A railway had been carried through the centre of Wandsworth Common, and when that had been done he presumed any other nuisance might be introduced. Tooting and Streatham had also been subject to encroachments. The Resolution was intended to promote the desirable object of preserving those open spaces which were so essential to the public health; but it would not embarrass the Government by pledging them to any particular mode of doing so. He thought the Resolution deserved the support of the House, and hoped his hon. Friend would press it to a division.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, it was much to be regretted that the open spaces in the neighbourhood of the metropolis had been allowed to be cut up by railways. When those railways were constructed, if there had been a public officer to protect the interests of the public, in all probability they would either have been stopped altogether or forced to take another direction. Until such an officer were appointed he was afraid the recreation grounds around London would continue to be encroached upon.

MR. TORRENS observed, that persons claiming to be lords of the manor were in the habit of laying hold of hundreds of acres in Epping Forest and elsewhere, without any steps being taken on the part of the Government to protect the rights of the Crown and of the commoners. It was high time that the Attorney General should be instructed by the Treasury to interfere in such cases.

MR. COWPER said, he entirely agreed with his hon. Friend that it was most desirable that some means should be taken to preserve the commons round London from inclosure at the rate that was going on. Wandsworth and Mitcham Commons, to say nothing of Epping Forest, had been largely encroached upon; but he thought his hon. Friend would not be advancing his object by the Resolution which he had proposed. The Government was not obliged or required to suggest a solution for the difficulty which was felt in the matter. Last year an Act of Parliament was passed which threw on the Metropolitan Board of Works the duty of looking after open spaces within their jurisdiction; but he believed they had not yet done anything in the matter, and he suspected that the present Resolution, if passed, would not remedy their failure. It would be far better to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the whole subject, and endeavour to ascertain how the difficulties now experienced could be overcome.

QUEEN'S PLATES.—RESOLUTION.

MR. PERCY WYNNDHAM said, that the attention of the country had lately been called to the alleged fact that the breed of our horses had greatly deteriorated in stoutness, soundness, and structural formation. On that point he begged to read to the House a portion of the letter addressed to the Speaker, and subsequently published in the Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society by Mr. Dickenson, a successful breeder of horses, and a high authority on the matter. Mr. Dickenson said—

“Great advances have been made in the breeding of cattle, sheep, and pigs, in every part of the United Kingdom during the last forty years. What is the case with regard to horses? Have they not retrograded in the same degree? Can the present race of horses be compared with those bred forty years since? The cart-horse, perhaps, is the only class that can bear the comparison. There is a cause for this which I shall mention hereafter. Formerly, Royal Plates of £100 each were given for competition all over England, for four-year olds, 10st. 4lb.; five years, 11st. 8lb.; six, and aged, 12st.; decided in four mile heats. Our horses were then the envy of the whole of Europe. These Royal Plates, for high weights and long distances, brought up our horses to this point of excellence; so long as they were so given so long we kept our supremacy; but, by some unfortunate influence the conditions were altered, and lighter weights and shorter distances allowed. From this point I date, under my own observation, the commencement of the deterioration of our thorough-bred horses, and consequently those in everyday use.”

Mr. Dickenson's experience extended back for a period of forty years, but Lord Redesdale, in introducing a Bill on that subject in the other House, said he had come across complaints as long ago as seventy, eighty, and ninety years, of the decreasing stoutness and soundness of our horses. The noble Lord the President of the Council thought he had reduced the argument of those who were constantly lamenting the deterioration of our breed of horses to an absurdity, when he quoted the opinion of a livery-stable keeper, who had told him that as long back as he could remember anything, he could remember these periodical complaints about the deterioration of our horses. How were they to account for that deterioration? He thought Mr. Dickenson hit only a part of the reason for it. The real reason, he believed, lay in the undoubted fact that the object of those who had the command of the turf always had been, and always must be, to entice as many persons as possible to come upon the turf—an object inconsistent with such a system as would maintain for us the breed of stout horses. He was aware there were many who utterly denied the statement that a deterioration had taken place; but there was evidence enough left to show that in former times horses ran six mile distances and four mile heats, carrying even twelve and sometimes thirteen stone, and remained five and six years on the turf, performing tasks which if they were to try to impose on a racehorse of the present day would kill the animal, and bring the owner within the penalties of Martin's Act. It was the fashion with some to say that our horses were never finer than they were at present, and that the accounts of the racing in olden times were not to be relied on. But he found it easier to believe that there had been a deterioration in the stoutness, soundness, and structural power of our horses, than to believe that all the feats as recorded as done by horses in the last century were a sham, and that pretending to run four-mile heats the jockeys had cantered the greater part of the way. The stamp of our horses had undergone a change. The modern racer stood over more ground than his predecessors, and had a longer stride; but that elongation was purchased by flatness of side, weakness of loin, and less capacity of chest. What was the remark that would at once be made by any one who looked at the pictures of our racehorses by a great artist fifty years ago? Why, that they looked more like hunters than racers, combining higher structural power, soundness, and stoutness, with the same amount of breeding. In a very interesting correspondence which had recently taken place between the Chief Secretary for Ireland and Admiral Rous, the gallant Admiral said—

"A racehorse which can run three miles is worth £3,000—a half-mile horse's value is £100, which is a sufficient bribe to exercise our ingenuity to produce stout runners."

And he also observes that—

"It is not to be supposed that a sane person will risk a horse worth £3,000 to run four miles under heavy weight, for a miserable prize of £100."

He was aware that Admiral Rous said he did not object to the modern system of handicap. He (Mr. Percy Wyndham) thought, however, that that system was regretted by almost all who were connected with the turf; and he had reason to believe that the opinion of Admiral Rous had undergone a change, for in a letter written after the debate in the House of Lords in 1860, he had said that "no man was a greater enemy to handicaps than himself," and that "the system encouraged trickery of every description." In the same letter the gallant Admiral used one of his very terse and expressive phrases—namely, that racing was "a game of weights." One thing to be deprecated was the running of horses at a too early age. The Earl of Derby, speaking in the House of Lords against the Bill of Lord Redesdale, said, that in 1829 the proportion of two-year-olds to three-year-olds on the turf was as two to eight, and that in 1859 it had increased to eight to seven. The proportion was still increasing, and that spring it had reached rather more than eight and a half to seven. It was beginning to be discovered that they could not with impunity play such tricks with nature as they had been doing for the last half century, and he maintained that a greater change had taken place during the last fifty years than during any other period. The system of Queen's Plates was most unsatisfactory. They occupied a sort of intermediate position. The weights were not heavy enough or the distances long enough to please those whose eyes were fixed on having good horses for practical purposes, and not for mere racing. Whilst, on the other hand, their rules had not been modified in such a way as to meet the requirements of modern times. One of the most recent alterations introduced was the allowing three-year-olds to run for Queen's Plates, and he regretted to say that the majority of our racehorses disappeared altogether from the turf at the end of their third year, when they were still in a state of infancy. He should not be at all sorry to see the old weights gone back to, though he admitted the difficulty there would be in having such an arrangement with the present system of running horses. When they found that of thirty-eight Queen's Plates run for in England, seventeen had been won by one mare, which had six or seven walks over, and that of seventeen Queen's Plates run for in Ireland, eight had been won by one animal, which had the appropriate name of Tourist, he thought they might arrive at the conclusion that some change was required. He rather agreed in Admiral Rous's opinion that we should have free trade in the matter; but if free trade meant an absence of State interference with the rules and regulations of the Turf, it also meant an absence of State subsidies. If the Queen's Plates were given not for a great public object, but for the mere purpose of encouraging sport, the Government ought to give some of the public money as prizes for cricket matches, or as subscriptions towards some of the fox hunts, which were much in want of funds. With regard to prizes, Mr. Dickenson makes these observations—

"When a prize of £100 was given by the Royal Agricultural Society at Battersea, the best six stallions were brought from all parts of the country, even a Derby winner, to whom was awarded the prize. Nevertheless, the object of the society was not obtained. It is not the winner of the Derby or St. Leger, a horse that will never be taken from his own stable door, that should come to an Agricultural Show, exhibit himself there, and walk off with the prize; but it is a good strong thoroughbred country stallion, that is available for the use of the ordinary mares of the country."

The fact was, we did not possess horses which were so useful for general purposes as those possessed by our forefathers. He had brought forward views which might be new to some and opposed to the preconceived ideas of others; but he felt certain that they would bear investigation, and find an echo in the opinion of many country gentlemen, farmers, and yeomen in this country. He thought that the present system ought not to receive any subsidy, however trifling, from the public funds. And he, therefore, begged to move that, as the annual grant of sums of money voted by that House for Queen's Plates no longer encouraged the breed of good horses, the object for which it was originally given, it should for the future be discontinued.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, as the annual grant of sums of money voted by this House for Queen's Plates no longer encourages the breed of good horses, the object for which it was originally given, it should, for the future, be discontinued."—(Mr. Percy Wyndham.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought that the hon. Member (Mr. Wyndham) who had just sat down, and who was entitled both by descent and from personal knowledge to offer an opinion on the matter, had done good service in bringing the subject under the notice of the House. He (Mr. Newdegate) had taken a great interest in the breeding of horses for the last twenty-five or twenty-six years, and he thought there was a great change in the character of our horses; but he did not believe that that change was entirely attributable to the character of our racing or our racehorses. The fact was that some few years ago, before railways were introduced, few hon. Members thought it a surprising feat if they had ridden twenty miles upon the road. Hon. Gentlemen would, however, bear him out that very few gentlemen now took a ride of twenty miles, and the truth was that unless a man was upon his horse for a considerable time and over a considerable space of ground he never found out what the animal was made of. To that circumstance was to be attributed the want of substance and power of endurance which was observable in many horses, and the fact that the ordinary horse or hack was not as useful as formerly because so much less used. Then railways had superseded the demand for second and third class horses. The roadster was not in demand as formerly, except for exportation. It would be a very sad thing if the breed of our horses were to deteriorate seriously; and he thought if public money was to be given in Queen's Plates for the purposes of improving the breed, it was well worthy the consideration of the Government whether such a change might not be adopted in the conditions as should give encouragement to the retention in this country of horses of substance and stoutness, such as really would improve the breed. He felt convinced that a mere change in the conditions of the Queen's Plates would not effect that; but he thought the advice of Admiral Rous, that the distance for Queen's Plates should never be less than three miles, was well worthy of consideration; and he was further of opinion that £100 for a Queen's Plate should not be given unless the private subscriptions were added to double or treble the amount of the public contribution. He believed the effect of such a regulation would be the retention in this country of an enduring, stout, weight-carrying class of racers for breeding purposes on terms available for the farmers. By this system of economy, the not giving the Plate unless a subscription was added, the Government might obtain a fund from which the value of the Plate, where given, might be gradually increased, without increasing the aggregate Vote for this purpose, and thus also secure the distribution of the prizes among horses of the character which was requisite for ordinary breeders. There was no doubt that the £100 was often won by inferior animals; and that in other cases a first-rate animal monopolized a number of plates for want of competition. Admiral Rous was right in saying that we should have larger prizes in order to secure the services of a requisite number of horses of the class which he had described.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, there was no doubt the amount of money given in Queen's Plates did not afford the same inducements to gentlemen to run their horses as it did when Queen's Plates were first established. That was the practical object for which those plates had been established; but he believed that since they were established the breed of horses in this country had in no way deteriorated. In Ireland there was a universal complaint of a want of good stallions; and Admiral Rous fairly put it, that if gentlemen would club together in Ireland and this country to keep good stallions there would be no reason to fear a deterioration of our stock of horses. But he differed from the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) in one particular. That hon. Gentleman said that no one would think of riding twenty or thirty miles now. Why he himself, only so late as the previous Saturday, rode thirty miles, and his horse displayed both ability and endurance. After the ride he probably felt much better than the horse, but yesterday the horse came out of the stable perfectly fresh. He believed that his noble Friend at the head of the Government was frequently in the habit of taking long rides, and there were other gentlemen also who preferred that sort of exercise to the railways. A sum of about £3,500, divided into thirty-six or thirty-eight prizes, was at present given in Queen's Plates; and though it was true that one horse in Ireland and another in England had won a great number of these prizes, and that in some cases there had been a walk over, that was not a reason for making a great alteration, which would entirely do away with that enjoyment, to maintain which he thought public encouragement should be given to race meetings. His noble Friend at the head of the Government authorized him to say the Government would consider the matter with the Master of the Horse, who, he believed, regulated the weights. His noble Friend did not authorize him to say that the weights would be increased, but that the Government, with the Master of the Horse, would consider whether an alteration might not be made as regarded the weights and distances in races for Queen's Plates, with a view of testing to a greater extent the capabilities of the horses. For himself, he did not share the opinion that those heavy weights and great distances were as desirable as some Gentlemen appeared to imagine. However, that was to be considered. He hoped his right hon. and gallant relative (General Peel), who was very conversant with the subject, would inform the House whether, in his opinion, the breed of horses in this country had deteriorated. He knew that the Government of France and other Governments had purchased some first-rate sires in this country. The Baron and other stallions had been purchased here by the French Government; but in this country we did by private enterprise what in France was done by the direct action of the Government and by other means. In his opinion the English breed of horses was able to compete with any that could be brought against them; but his noble Friend at the head of the Government was ready to assure the hon. Gentleman that with respect to distance and weight the question would be considered, in order to see whether any improvement could be made in conducting to the objects for which these plates were originally established.

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, I disagree with the opinion that the breed of horses in this country has deteriorated. I have been for at least forty years a breeder of this class of horses, and if my authority is worth anything it is certainly opposed to that of Mr. Dickenson, for I believe that we have never before bred such horses for endurance and speed as now. The hon. Member's proposal is that the grant for Queen's Plates should be put an end to, "as it no longer encourages the breed of good horses." Now, I requested the hon. Gentleman to postpone his Motion, and I did so because on the 1st of next month there is a show of horses in this town, and I believe there will be 300 hunters, forty-two thoroughbred horses, with hacks and horses of every description. I wanted the House to judge for itself whether the breed of horses had fallen off or not. In the Easter vacation I went to see two studs of horses—one belonging to a noble Lord who unfortunately did not run first but ran second for the Derby. He had thirty-six horses in training and I think eighteen of them would have carried me. I do not think I can give better proof of the quality of the present breeds of horses.

Mr. Newdegate

My other visit was paid to the hon. Member for Hythe (Baron Rothschild), who possesses as fine a stud of horses as can be seen anywhere. So far from the breed of horses having fallen off, I believe there never was a time when thoroughbred steeds were more surely going back to that size and power which formerly distinguished them. Objection is taken to the racing of two-year-olds. And what is proposed? Why, to do away with all the races for old horses, all the weight-for-age races, and to abolish the Queen's Plates. I say it is impossible to toll to what degree these Queen's Plates encourage the breed of horses. You cannot judge of this at all by the number of horses which run for them. After horses have passed their third year, a man is inclined to ask, "What can I do with them?" "Oh!" he thinks, "I can run them for Queen's Plates;" and this attaches a value to these horses which otherwise they would not possess, and without which they might go out of the country. But then it is said, "These horses ought to run longer distances and with heavier weights." Well, I say in reply that Admiral Rous is quite right, and that if you do so you will have none but common hacks running for Queen's Plates. No man would run good horses in four-mile heats with heavy weights for £100. At the same time, horses now-a-days are as capable of running four-mile heats with ten stone on their backs as they ever were. Forty years ago I recollect it was thought a miracle when a two-year-old won the Feather Plate at Newmarket—three miles. Now, nothing else wins. I had much rather that the two-year-olds did not run in these races, but the fact I mention shows how the breed has improved. If the breed of horses has fallen off, buyers must certainly be extraordinary people, because they now give higher prices for thoroughbred horses than they ever gave before. Look at the prices fetched for yearlings at sales during the present year, including that of the Royal studs at Hampton Court. Depend upon it, the public do not give these higher prices for brutes. Among the starters for the last Derby there were four or five of the finest horses that have run for many a year—certainly as fine as have run during my recollection. In my opinion there is nothing in the world like a thoroughbred English horse; and if you tried to produce large coach-horses you certainly would not improve the breed. I recollect the famous match of 200 miles in ten hours that Mr. Osbaldeston won at Newmarket. Did he choose great hunters or strong half-bred horses? Not at all. Every horse he rode was thoroughbred, and he did not care what they were; he took any horse which was in training, and never varied in this choice. He rode each horse four miles, his riding weight being ten stone. One horse carried him four times. It went sixteen miles in thirty-two minutes, and no half-bred horse would ever have done that. Well, then, hon. Members say, "Why should the public give this money for Queen's Plates?" Now I am prepared to make this proposal to the Government:—They give £3,300 a year in Queen's Plates. But they take £7,000 a year in an extra tax levied on racehorses. Why put an additional tax on racehorses? Why not pay the exact tax that other horses pay? If this is done, owners of racehorses do not want the Queen's Plates. There is no class of people who enter more into the free trade spirit than racing men. We have not sought to shut out foreign horses. We have always upheld free trade for the turf; we have challenged foreign horses to come over here and compete with ours; and we have even given them weight because it was thought that they hardly stood upon equal terms with English horses. It is true that in France at present they have better horses than they used to have, but these horses are every one of them of English blood. There is not a single country abroad where country bred horses run—all of them are English bred, and buyers come to England for them. I can only say again that I think the hon. Member is quite wrong in holding that our breed of horses has deteriorated, and is still more at fault in the manner in which he seeks to rectify this supposed deterioration—that is to say, by doing away with Queen's Plates, the only races left for old horses to run in. If the Government have determined to reconsider the question of weights and distances, I only hope that they will consult those who are the best judges of what is likely to promote the interests of racing. I should not have ventured to express these opinions if I had any interest in the question; but, as I no longer own a racehorse, I have no personal interest in the matter whatever, except what arises from my great desire to assist in any measures that may improve the breed of English horses.

Mn. GREGORY said, he was also of opinion that the breed of horses had not deteriorated, and that it would be unwise to adopt the recommendation of the hon. Member. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had last spoken had comprehended the whole question in the observations he had made. He (Mr. Gregory) maintained, however, that the Queen's Plates might be better arranged in Ireland. At present, of the fifteen Queen's Plates run for in Ireland, eleven were run for at the Curragh, and the result was that one horse came over for one week to the Curragh and swept away all the prizes. He proposed that about three more Queen's Plates should be run for in the provinces in Ireland, and over any proper racecourse, whenever a sufficient sum of money was forthcoming. He thought that such additional prizes would have the effect of keeping the old horses in the country.

MR. FOLJAMBE believed that the exportation of the finest young mares, which was now carried on to a great extent, had something to do with the deterioration of the breed of horses. Fifty mares had been taken from one district alone. That was indeed killing the goose that laid the golden eggs. It would be very desirable if some means could be devised for putting a stop to this export, consistently with justice to the breeders and with the principles of free trade.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I entirely agree with my hon. and gallant Friend opposite, and utterly differ from those who contend that the breed of English horses has deteriorated. I believe, on the contrary, that the horses bred in this country are better as to size, substance, and endurance than they ever were. Any man going into a racing stable, and seeing their size, their bone and substance, must ask himself what he could wish to have better in the shape of a four-legged animal. The fact is that greater pains are taken now than used to be taken formerly to force on the young horse, and bring him to a greater size at two years old than used to be the case. There is one very good test. If the breed were deteriorated, foreigners would not come to England to buy English horses. But the complaint is that more and more persons come every year from different parts of the Continent to buy English horses; and I say that is a proof that the English horse is a good one. The other day I had a deputation from gentlemen connected with the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland, complaining of deterioration in the breed of horses there. But in the course of conversation, it was stated that from one port in Ireland—namely, Dublin—5,000 horses were shipped in the course of last year. That, at least, is a proof that the Irish horse is worth buying, and worth carrying elsewhere. There can be no doubt that the laws of supply and demand exercise the same influence over the breed of horses as over the manufacture of any other article. If there be a demand, depend upon it that somehow or other there will be an adequate supply. With regard to the particular Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite, I have no objection to say that the question shall be considered by the Master of the Horse in connection with those who are the best judges of the turf, to see whether a return to greater weights and greater distances would be advisable, with a view of improving the breed of horses. But I think there is great force in what fell from the hon. and gallant Officer, that to abolish prizes applying to horses of greater age than the usual sweepstakes, so far from doing any good, would, on the contrary, do harm. The hon. Gentleman will probably not think it necessary to take the sense of the House on this Motion.

MR. PERCY WYNNDHAM said, he had to thank the noble Lord for the promise which he had given, and he would withdraw his Motion.

ELECTION PETITIONS ACT (1848) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Bill to amend "The Election Petitions Act, 1848," in certain particulars, ordered * to be brought in by Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN and Mr. ADAIR.

ELECTION PETITIONS BILL—[BILL 17.] COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [1st June], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the Election Petitions Act (1848), and the Act for the better discovery and prevention of Bribery and Treating at Elections,"—(Mr. Ayrton)
—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID was proceeding to address the House, when—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at half after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, June 29, 1864.

Their Lordships met; and having gone through the business on the paper, without debate,

House adjourned at Four o'clock,

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HENNESSY, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, he would show that the principal objection which would probably be urged to the measure—its expense—was unfounded. Very exaggerated estimates had been formed as to the results of the clause introduced at his instance into the Poor Law Act two years ago, enabling Poor Law Guardians to place out deserted and orphan children to nurse until the age of eight years. It was said that the effect of the clause would be to entail an enormous additional expense upon the ratepayer. But the Irish Poor Law Commission in their last Report showed that, instead of the additional expense being of a serious nature, the number of children relieved under that clause for the half year ending September 1863 was 169, which, at an average cost of £5 for each child, gave a total cost of about £800. From that amount must, however, be deducted the cost that would have attended their rearing in the workhouse, so that the increase was scarcely perceptible. The measure he was about to ask the House to read a second time, proposed to deal not with children, but with the able-bodied poor; it was purely a permissive measure, and in proof of the feeling of the people of Ireland in regard to the suggestion he would point to the fact that not a single petition had been presented against the Bill, while in that and former Sessions numerous petitions in favour of conferring on the Poor Law Commissioners additional powers had been forwarded. The measure consisted of but a single clause, and with the exception of such verbal alterations as were requisite to make its provisions applicable to Ireland was copied verbatim from the English Act. He desired to take that opportunity of acknowledging the courtesy with which the secretary to the English Poor Law Board had facilitated his labours in drawing up the Bill by enabling him to consult the legal adviser of that Board. The English system had been recommended by competent authorities; the people of Ireland asked for it; and upon what grounds would its extension to the sister country be denied? If the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, or his noble Friend the Member for Cockermouth (Lord Naas), intended to argue that a harsher Poor Law was indispensable for Ireland, upon them would rest the duty of proving its necessity and of justifying the anomaly. There were three considerations in favour of the measure. The first was that of economy, for the Bill would have the effect of reducing the rates. The House could not fail to be struck with the remarkable fact mentioned in the official Report, that while $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the population in England, and 4 per cent in Scotland, were relieved, in Ireland the average daily number of those whose necessities were relieved was under 1 per cent. Was Ireland, then, so much a richer country than England or Scotland? If not it was clear there was something wrong in the Irish Poor Law. The outdoor relief in England and Scotland was shown to cost very nearly the same—namely, about 1s. 6d. per head per week on the average daily number. In Ireland the cost of workhouse maintenance and clothing alone amounted to 2s. 3d. per head per week, and, adding that to the other expenses, the total amount was about 3s. 10d. per head per week. Thus it appeared that by adopting the English system, more than double the present number could be relieved and an actual saving effected upon the present rates. No doubt, it would be said that if the English system were extended to Ireland more than double the present number would claim relief. But his answer was, that the Bill being only permissive, the Commissioners would at all times have power to check excessive demands; they might, if they chose, relieve double the present number, and then stop short at that point. He did not quite concur with those who thought the North of Ireland the most progressive portion of the country, but, taking one or two unions there for the purposes of comparison with England, he found that in the union of Drumsnahy, county of Donegal, £333 was expended on the maintenance of the poor, £209 in salaries and rations to officers, and £123 in other expenses, making a total of £332 for establishment charges as against £333 spent upon the poor. Sixpence out of every shilling contributed by the ratepayers, therefore, went for staff and expenses. In Stranowar £502 was laid out upon the poor, and no less than £590 on establishment charges, salaries, &c. What was the case in England? Taking that part nearest to Ireland with which hon. Members were best acquainted, he found that in Holyhead no less than £9,300 out of £10,000 collected from the ratepayers was spent upon the poor, £156 of the balance even being devoted to the maintenance of lunatics. The proportions were stated to be that in England and Scotland six-sevenths of the applicants were relieved out of the workhouse, while in Ireland only one-thirtieth of the relief afforded was given out of doors. There was another consideration well worthy of attention—that of public policy. The English Commissioners in their Report gave a very interesting account of the outdoor relief which it was found necessary to give at Birkenhead for a few weeks during the prevalence of excessive frost. The cost was exceedingly moderate, the men were well conducted; and, as soon as the temporary pressure was removed, the men returned to their labour, again to increase the wealth of the community. Many of those dock labourers so relieved were Irishmen. Had a similar frost happened in Dublin the same men would have been obliged to go into the workhouse or starve. The law was clear on that point. They must either have gone with their families into the workhouse, to become, perhaps, hereditary paupers, or else, having once incurred the workhouse brand, they would have fled from the country the moment they got out of doors again. A Member of that House told him he met not long ago a party of Irish emigrants, a servant girl was with them, and as domestic servants were wanted in Ireland he asked her why she was going to America. She told him she had been forced in a moment of temporary distress to ask for relief. She had been driven into the workhouse, and having the stain of the workhouse upon her she could do nothing but emigrate. The same feeling prevailed among the working population after they had been forced into the workhouse. The people of Ireland were well aware that a different law existed in England. Professor Ingram, of Trinity College, Dublin, said on the subject that one of the greatest evils of Ireland was the disaffection to the Government which undeniably existed, and which it was the duty of the Government to remedy. The Professor asked what must be the feeling of the Irish working man when the law dealt more liberally with the English than the Irish labourer; and he added that it could not be pretended that Irishmen and Englishmen lived under the same law when such a difference existed. The vast majority of the Irish people concurred in opinion with Professor Ingram. Was this a United Kingdom? What was the meaning of a United Kingdom? It was not a mere geographical expression, but indicated a union of laws and institutions, and especially the laws affecting the poor. If the poor of Ireland were more harshly treated than those who live nearer the centre of Government, the loyal attachment to the Government that should exist in Ireland was necessarily disturbed. There remained to be considered the question of morality. He contended that any measure that would substitute outdoor relief for indoor relief would tend to promote morality. He had a mass of evidence in his possession from guardians, and taken before the Committee on the Irish Poor Laws on the subject. He might remind the House of the evidence of Colonel Latouche, of Dublin, who described the horrible treatment that the women and children received in the Irish union workhouses. When he alluded to the subject in the debate of last March he was told that a system of classification existed in most of the workhouses of Ireland. It was not, however, a moral but a physical classification. Young girls who were driven to the workhouse were not forced to associate with women suffering from contagious diseases, but they associated with women of bad character and having illegitimate children with them. He might read replies of the Boards of Guardians to the Sanitary Commission, but it would be enough to note that classification did not exist in the workhouses of Ireland, and that it was operating against the morality of the people. He contended, therefore, that economy, public policy, and morality alike required the measure. But there was a further consideration. There had been debates on the loss of population by Irish emigration, and, although the Government would not consent to express their regret at the decline of the population, the general feeling of all enlightened and sensible men was that the decline was to be regretted. He was convinced that the laws in operation in Ireland for the so-called relief of the poor greatly tended to promote that emigration. The labouring man knew that if he crossed the Channel he would receive outdoor relief if he were sick and out of work. It was the natural right of the poor man to solicit alms, but there were laws in England and Ireland to prevent him from exercising that right. To ask alms was not opposed to the law of God, who told us that we should give alms and that almsgiving was a good deed. But our laws were opposed to the law of God, and they punished the poor man who asked for alms. A certain mode was prescribed in which alms, if they could be so called, were to be given, namely, money was collected in the shape of rates, and they were administered by a Board, and the poor were to receive relief only in the way prescribed by such Board. Upon those, therefore, who enacted those laws was thrown the onus of providing the administration of relief, that should, as far as possible, be consistent with the social and moral interests of the poor. The very reverse, however, was the case in Ireland. They compelled the poor to receive relief by entering a prison, and to live on a diet far inferior to that which he would receive in a common prison. Some of the Irish Judges had remarked that the workhouses must be dreadful places, when offences were committed by prisoners for the purpose of being transferred from the workhouses to the gaols. In May, 1829, the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) speaking of an Irish Poor Law, said that if Parliament established a Poor Law in Ireland it would give a right to able-bodied men out of employment to be supported in the same way as in England, namely, by means of outdoor relief. A Commission was appointed in 1834 to inquire into the Poor Laws, and the expediency of extending them to Ireland. Lord John Russell was then at the head of affairs, and his Government, unfortunately for Ireland, reversed the recommendation of the Commission and determined not to extend the English Poor Law to Ireland. Mr. Nicholls, the Poor Law Commissioner, was sent to Ireland, and his Report, written after nine weeks' inquiry, was allowed to upset the recommendation of Irish gentlemen who had known the country all their lives. Lord John Russell, who never touched Ireland but to damage it, passed the present Poor Law, and he would not venture to say how many hundreds and thousands of persons it had driven from the shores of Ireland. That Act was amended by another passed in 1847, and the principle of outdoor relief had been slightly extended in 1862 upon his (Mr. Hennessy's) Amendment relative to orphan and deserted children, which had proved highly beneficial in its operation. He trusted he had shown the House that his measure was recommended by economy, policy, and morality, and he therefore asked the House to give a second reading to his Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

LORD NAAS said, he very much regretted that his hon. Friend had thought fit to revive a question which had been amply discussed in an early part of the Session, when it was shown to the satisfaction of the House that the subject had also been very fully discussed and considered by the Committee on the Irish Poor Laws two years ago. That Committee expressed what might be fairly regarded as an almost unanimous opinion against the views and principles which the hon. Member had laid down. He would not detain the House at any length, because in the early part of the Session he had expressed a conviction that nothing had happened in connection with the operation of the Poor Law system to contradict or invalidate the opinion so authoritatively expressed by the Select Committee. The hon. Member tried to make the House believe that he merely wished to assimilate the law of England and Ireland. The whole spirit and working of the Irish Poor Law was essentially different from that of England. The English law was intended, in the majority of cases, merely to assist in the relief of the poor, and did not pretend actually to support the person. But the relief given to the poor of Ireland was absolutely complete; it extended to their clothing, lodging, food, maintenance, and went even to the education of the children of the paupers. It was not fair, therefore, to compare the English with the Irish law. But was not the hon. Gentleman aware that complaints were made every day of the working of the English system? Were there not paragraphs and letters in the public papers complaining of the insufficiency of the relief given in this city? It was true the hon. Gentleman had copied part of the words of a clause found in the English Act, the 4 & 5 Will. IV. That clause, however, was passed, not with the view of establishing, but with the entirely different object of limiting and arresting the evils of outdoor relief in England. The Poor Law Commissioners also issued a prohibitory order, which positively arrested, in four-fifths of the unions of England, the operation of the clause which the hon. Member wished to make general throughout Ireland. This order declared that every able-bodied person requiring relief should be, in the unions named in the schedule, wholly relieved in the workhouse of the union, together with his wife and family. A few classes of applicants were alone excepted—the sick and infirm, those suffering from accidents, and widows with one or more legitimate children. Therefore the hon. Gentleman's measure would, if it were adopted, have a far wider operation than the English Act, unless it were accompanied by a like prohibitory order. The hon. Member, however, had not disguised his object, for he had distinctly contended that the poor had a right to relief, and he would acknowledge that right without any limitation whatever. He wished, therefore, to extend the powers of his Bill to every union in Ireland. He had also endeavoured to show that the Irish Poor Law was harsh and unsuited to the wants of the poor. The allegation was strongly urged before the Irish Poor Law Committee of two years ago. It was stated that there was no doubt a great dislike on the part of the labouring man to go into the poor-house, but the charge of harshness in the administration of the law was not proved in the slightest degree. It was shown, on the contrary, that the poor who came under the operation of the Poor Law were as well and as kindly treated as the circumstances admitted. Still a Poor Law must of itself be somewhat uninviting, and it behoved those who were intrusted with its administration to take care that no encouragement should be given to idleness, and that persons who could support themselves were not induced to claim relief from the rates. The Boards of Guardians in Ireland possessed, in fact, certain limited powers of granting relief, but they were seldom exercised from the feeling that they would lead to danger and waste. He believed that it would be impossible to carry out any system of outdoor relief in Ireland without great risk. The evils of such a system would be, in fact, so great that they would have the effect of rendering the Poor Law system unworkable. The whole system would come to a dead lock, and the poor would ultimately become the victims of the attempt made to promote their welfare. The hon. Member had spoken of public opinion in Ireland being on the side of his Bill. He believed, on the contrary, that it was almost entirely arrayed against such a proposal. The Poor Law Guardians already had the power of extending the system of outdoor relief to widows with two or more children, to the sick and infirm, and those who were disabled by accident and temporary illness. The guardians, however, in the interest of the ratepayers as well as the poor, rarely availed themselves of the powers they possessed under the present law. The elected guardians shared the opinions of the ex officio guardians on the subject, and as a class they were almost unanimous in their indisposition to extend outdoor relief to the poor. The hon. Member had referred to Scotland in support of his Bill, but an extraordinary number of abuses and malversations had been shown to exist under the system of relief as it existed in that country. Hundreds and thousands of persons were receiving relief who were in no wise entitled to be considered paupers. Workhouses were now rising in every direction in Scotland, and attempts were being otherwise made to remedy the evils arising from indiscriminate outdoor relief. The hon. Gentleman asserted that every man had a right to ask alms, but that was a principle which was not likely to command the assent of Parliament, which had always enforced the operation of the mendicity laws. The Legislature was always threatened with disaffection in Ireland as the penalty for passing or for not passing this or that measure. He did not believe that the Irish Poor Law system had been the cause of disaffection in that country. The Irish people recollected the magnificent grant of £8,000,000 voted by Parliament for the relief of the famine, and the action of the House towards Ireland could never be quoted as a justification of disaffection. He believed, indeed, that no such feeling existed in Ireland. Believing that the Bill would be injurious to Ireland, he had therefore to move, That it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Lord Naas.)

MR. BAGWELL said, if his hon. Friend were as well acquainted with the condition of Ireland as he was with the forms and proceedings of the House of Commons he would never have brought in that Bill. If passed into law, its effects would be disastrous to the small farmers of Ireland, and most injurious to the class whom it was the object of the hon. Gentleman to benefit. The small farmers holding some only four acres and others about sixteen, or on average ten acres, would be destroyed by the Bill. The poor in Ireland were, on the whole, very well taken care of. In 1862 the total sum raised for their support was £779,682 on a valuation of £12,000,000. The dreadful occurrences which happened every day in England could not possibly occur in Ireland from the way in which the Poor Law there was managed. They never heard in Ireland of whole families dying of starvation, such as might be read of in The Times of that day, as happening in this country. And the reason was because the Irish Poor Law gave the poor man in distress, no matter whether he came from the extremity of the earth or was an inhabitant of the district, a right to immediate relief; he was not bandied about from one workhouse to another, but the relieving officer was bound to see that relief was given without stint, and that everything was done which could and ought to be done. There were, no doubt, many unions in Ireland in which the system was not well carried out, but that was not the fault of the law, which established local administration, supplemented by Government supervision. The law, if properly administered, was humane and just. There was a great difference under the present system in the rates as they fell upon the towns and upon the country districts. When the town was taxed 4s. or 5s. in the pound, the adjacent country district might have to pay only 5d., 6d., or 7d. In the county of Tipperary, which might be considered as an instance of good management, where, for the most part, the proprietors were resident, and which he believed might be looked upon as a fair sample of what Ireland in the course of years might be expected to be, Clonmel paid in one part 4s. in the pound, in another 3s., while an adjoining district, which threw a large proportion of the paupers into the town, paid only 7d. But, if outdoor relief were to be given, it would be the entire destruction of the property of the towns, which, in Ireland, from the fact that they had newsrooms and mechanics' institutions, were the nucleus of civilization. His hon. and learned Friend had argued that the effect of giving outdoor relief would be to diminish the expense. But that could not possibly be the result, because the establishments of the workhouses—medical officers, masters, relieving officers, &c., would have to be kept up. Any Irish gentleman who recollected 1848 must know that while the people hated the workhouses, they delighted in outdoor relief, whether they wanted it or not. And when a magistrate remonstrated with one of them, and said, "Is it not a shame for you, a man who has money in the bank, to look for outdoor relief?" the reply was, "Oh! your honour, why wouldn't I get it as well as another?" In fact, they thought they had a right to get a portion of that to which they themselves had contributed. A gentleman in Cork had called his attention to the fact that some of his own tenants were applying for relief—men who did not want it, but got it for their aunts and other relatives, and he put a stop to the practice. But he knew cases of men who had £1,000 in the bank receiving relief. That feeling was as strong as ever, and he should oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he thought that both the last speakers had very much exaggerated the dangers of the measure. The principle of the Bill was purely permissive—it gave the Commissioners power under certain circumstances to order outdoor relief to be given to persons who under the present law would not be entitled to obtain it. The debates which they had had night after night in that House were sufficient to show that the Poor Law as at present administered was not capable of meeting the distress. The chief objection to the Irish Poor Law system was, its undue severity of operation, and strict adherence to the rigid rules of political economy. He would ask what would have been the state of England if in some periods of severe distress, such as had occurred in 1841 and 1848, no relief was to be given except in the workhouses? Would it not have required a large standing army to prevent outbreaks? There were many parts of Ireland where the poor were suffering severe hardships, but where there were no resident landlords or wealthy charitable people to relieve them, and where, therefore, the want of some such law as that proposed by the hon. Member was felt. There was very much less to fall back upon in Ireland in times of distress than in England. The noble Lord the Member for Cocker-mouth had adduced the case of Scotland as furnishing an example of the abuse of outdoor relief. But such abuse occurred chiefly in places where there were no workhouses, and therefore no means of applying the workhouse test. In Ireland, on the other hand, there were ample facilities for the application of the test. When it was first proposed to introduce the Poor Law system into Ireland there were the greatest objections to it, and the greatest fears were expressed as to its probable working. He believed that in the old times more landowners in Ireland were ruined by the indiscriminate charity they had to bestow in consequence of there being no Poor Law than were ruined by personal extravagance, and he was convinced that it would have been far better for Ireland if she had got the Poor Law system 100 years before, and, holding that the fears which were entertained of the effect of the introduction of outdoor relief were equally unfounded, he was prepared to give his cordial support to the Bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the feeling of the House seemed to be so adverse to the Bill that he trusted the hon. Gentleman would not press the Motion to a division. It was quite evident that it was the opinion of the House that, after the recent legislation with regard to the Irish Poor Laws, it was inexpedient to proceed as the hon. Member now desired. The hon. Gentleman's complaint was, that the administration of the Poor Law in Ireland was not sufficiently elastic, and he wanted, therefore, to assimilate the law of the two countries and to give power to the Commissioners to issue orders to the guardians to give outdoor relief. But that would be a fundamental change in the Irish system. The hon. Gentleman, referring to the Act of 1862, which he (Sir Robert Peel) had the honour to get passed, said that it was only a trifling modification of the system. But could that be called a trifling modification which had raised the numbers who received relief under it from 3,000 to 10,000. It had been well pointed out by the noble Lord the Member for Cocker-mouth, that the 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 56—which the hon. Gentleman cited in support of his present Motion—was intended to check the abuse of outdoor relief. When the hon. Gentleman said that public opinion had expressed itself strongly on the question, and that a number of petitions had been presented in support of the principle of his measure in 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864, he (Sir Robert Peel) took the liberty of saying that during 1863, after the passing of the Act of 1862, no petitions had been presented on the subject. And the petitions which had been presented during the other three years did not ask for an assimilation of the laws of the two countries, but had been mainly with respect to the payment of certain salaries, the superannuation of Poor Law Officers, and the re-adjustment of Poor

Mr. Bagwell

Law taxation. The hon. Gentleman referred to a petition presented in 1862, signed by the Roman Catholic bishops, and insinuated that he (Sir Robert Peel) told the House that it was not competent for them, that it was out of their province, to petition Parliament on the subject. The hon. Gentleman must have misinterpreted what he said, because, considering the position of the Roman Catholic bishops with respect to the poor in Ireland, they, of all others, were the persons who ought to petition. He certainly had not intended by any word which he used on that occasion to convey a different opinion. With regard to the superannuation of the workhouse officers, (as his right hon. Friend (Mr. C. P. Villiers) had passed a Bill with respect to English officials, he (Sir Robert Peel) trusted that next Session the House would give him an opportunity of passing a similar measure for Ireland. Out of forty-three petitions presented from Ireland this year on the subject of superannuation allowances, &c., there was only one from the county of Wexford—and that had been going the round of all the unions of Ireland—which prayed that the English Poor Law might be assimilated to the Poor Law in force in Ireland, which was the entire reverse of the system which the hon. Gentleman wished to introduce. The present law was, in fact, quite sufficient to meet the wants of the people of Ireland. As to the charge that the system was not elastic, when he could show that, in 1849, 1,210,482 persons had received outdoor relief in Ireland, that in 1859 the number was reduced to 5,455, and that in 1864 it was 10,000, he thought he was fairly entitled to call the system elastic. He trusted, therefore, the House would not concur in the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. The first clause of the Bill would give the Commissioners power to issue orders to the guardians to give outdoor relief. But the Commissioners did not want that power, for they believed the local guardians did their duty, and it would be an invidious thing to impose on them the task of making such orders. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the dietary in Ireland as lower than in England or Scotland. But, from an interesting Return moved for by the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce), it would be seen that the quantity and the quality of nutriment, as ascertained upon analysis, allowed to each pauper was superior in Ireland to what it was in England. The hon. Gentleman had said that the introduction of outdoor relief would be productive of economy. But how did the case stand? The population of Scotland in 1862 was 3,062,294, and the total expenditure for the relief of the poor for the year ending May, 1862, amounted to £726,517. In Ireland the population in 1862 was 5,798,564, and the expenditure for the poor, inclusive of medical relief, was £685,647, or £40,870 less than in Scotland, although the population in Ireland was nearly double. Therefore they had in Ireland a much more economic system than in Scotland. The hon. Gentleman endeavoured to show that the workhouse system was productive of emigration, and that it did not pay sufficient regard to the social and moral wants of the poor. But every one who knew the interest which that question had excited in the House also knew that they were desirous to work the system with as much humanity, efficiency, and at the same time regard for the rights of property as was consistent with the wants which it was sought to relieve. He trusted, therefore, the House would not pass the measure.

MR. BLAKE said, the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell) had stated if his hon. Friend knew as much about the condition of Ireland as he did about the forms and proceedings of the House he would not have brought in that Bill. But he begged to say that his hon. Friend was in constant communication with the bishops and other dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, who, of course, knew the condition of the Irish people perfectly well, and therefore he was quite sure that his hon. Friend was as well acquainted with the state of Ireland as he was with the forms of that House. The hon. Member for Clonmel had argued that the Bill if passed would lead to a vast increase of expenditure. But it appeared while the Union expenses in Clonmel amounted to 2s. in the pound, in Tipperary, where the amount of outdoor relief was considerably greater, the poundage was only the same, and in the whole of Munster the average was only 1s. 3½d. That showed that if more outdoor relief was given in the Clonmel Union the expenses probably would be less. He denied altogether the justice of the statement of the hon. Member, that the disposition of the Irish people was to take relief, and that respectable families would get relief for their aunts and other relatives. The hon. Gentleman also said that he knew a man who had £1,000 in the bank who yet took relief. But, though there might be an exceptional case, any person who knew anything of Ireland must know that to take poor relief was the very last thing an Irishman would consent to do, because from that moment he would feel himself degraded. His only regret with regard to the Bill was that his hon. Friend had not proposed to give to the Board of Guardians themselves that permissive power in regard to outdoor relief which he proposed to give to the Poor Law Commissioners. He trusted that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would not persist in his opposition to a Bill the object of which was to place the Irish poor on the same footing as the English poor.

MR. O'REILLY said, that he had on a previous occasion dissented from the proposition for a total assimilation of the Irish Poor Law to the English Poor Law, yet he admitted that crises might frequently occur in which a more extended power of giving outdoor relief, or a means of adapting the mode of relief to peculiar circumstances which might arise, would be desirable in Ireland. The Bill before the House went to that extent only, it being a measure simply to invest the Poor Law Commissioners with a discretionary power to make modifications in the prescribed mode of relief. If the Bill should go into Committee, he would move an Amendment giving to the Boards of Guardians a discretion to carry out those modifications or not, for he thought that to the local administrators should be left the power and responsibility of administering such a law.

MR. GEORGE said, he had at first experienced difficulty in understanding upon what principle the Bill was founded, and how it was to be carried out. Some light, however, had been thrown upon the Bill by the speeches which had been made on that occasion. It appeared that the Bill had been blindly copied from an English Bill which was passed under totally different circumstances. The intention of the Bill was to extend outdoor relief in Ireland, while the intention of the English Bill was to limit the powers of Boards of Guardians in certain cases. The hon. Member for the King's County sought to give to the Poor Law Commissioners power to make orders to extend the system of outdoor relief in Ireland; but the power given to the Boards of Guardians to suspend those orders for thirty days amounted to a complete suicide of the Bill itself. The only cases he could conceive in which the Poor Law Commissioners should be expected to make provision to extend outdoor relief were cases of severe famine, pestilence, and general fever; and it certainly appeared a mockery that the guardians should have the power of suspending, under such circumstances, the orders of the Commissioners for a period of thirty days. It had been stated that there was a universal desire in Ireland to extend the system of outdoor relief. He respectfully denied that there was even a general desire for this change; on the contrary, the Boards of Guardians were at the present time unwilling to act upon the powers they had in that respect. By the original Poor Law Act, every destitute person, wherever he might happen to be in Ireland for the moment, was admissible into a workhouse; and by the amended Poor Law Act very large and extended powers were vested in the Boards of Guardians to give outdoor relief in cases where that mode of relief was most required. The extension of outdoor relief would greatly deteriorate the habits of the people, would destroy the small class of farmers by increasing the rates to a degree impossible for them to bear, and would thus tend to compel many persons to quit the country.

MR. MONSELL said, he regarded the present Bill as intended to introduce the small edge of the wedge with the view of ultimately assimilating the Poor Law in Ireland to the Poor Law in England. If it were desired to destroy the Irish farmer and to increase emigration tenfold, all that was necessary was to follow the course which the hon. Member for the King's County called upon the House to pursue. Mr. Senior, one of the Poor Law Commissioners, had stated that to introduce the English Poor Law into Ireland would increase the rates to an enormous extent, and be a great national calamity. The evidence of all experienced men was to the same effect, and he contended that the course recommended by the hon. Member for the King's County was not in accordance with the wishes of the intelligent classes in Ireland. The hon. Member had startled him by declaring that the authority of the noble Lord at the head of the Government was in favour of the present proposition; but he found that the noble Lord's speech, to which reference was made, was a diatribe against the introduction of Poor Laws into Ireland at all, as Poor Laws put hastily into operation might make Ireland one vast poorhouse. He had also cited the commission of which Drs. Murray and Whately were members, which sat nearly thirty years ago, as favourable to his views, but that Commission recommended that Poor Law relief should not be given to the able-bodied. The Irish Poor Law Guardians had at present the power of granting outdoor relief in certain cases; and he had himself proposed in the Limerick Board, which was composed of ninety guardians, one-half of whom were elected by the ratepayers, that they should afford outdoor relief to the families of persons disabled by accident or sickness, and who would be actually under the eyes of the guardians in the workhouse hospitals; but the proposition had been ignominiously scouted, and he had never seen a stronger opposition than that which it had met from the elected, as well as from the ex officio guardians. As to the question of economy, did the hon. Member believe for one instant, if the great majority of the persons requiring relief were to be relieved out of the workhouse that the cost would not be trebled or quadrupled? At all events, the ratepayers in Ireland believed that such would be the case.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that it was a very strong argument against the Bill that it would give to a board in Dublin and not to the local authorities, who knew the necessities of their districts, the power to make the proposed extension in outdoor relief. The assertion that people going into the workhouse for relief received thereby a moral stain which never could be effaced was totally unfounded, for he knew that in his part of the country the most respectable farmers continually applied to the workhouse to obtain young girls for the purpose of employing them in work at their farmhouses. He would certainly give his vote against the Bill.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that he was in favour of the principle of the Bill, but from the tone of the observations which had already been made in the course of the discussion he did not believe that it would be carried, and he, therefore, suggested that the hon. Member for the King's County should not press the measure to a division.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to direct attention to two petitions—one from Limerick and the other presented by the hon. Member for Roscommon, praying that in certain cases outdoor relief might be given in Ireland as in England. Those petitions proved that there was a wish on the part of a large number of persons for a more liberal administration of the Poor Law in Ireland. He intended to vote for the second reading of the Bill, on the one ground that he was in favour of an extension of the Poor Law by which relief could be afforded to a greater number than received it at present. The details of the Bill might be considered in Committee, and no one would be bound to them by voting for the second reading. The number of persons receiving relief could not be taken as any indication of the real state of the country. By granting outdoor relief more extensively much might be done to preserve the status of the lower classes of the population, for when a family had gone into the workhouse, its self-respect was destroyed. No moral stigma ought to attach to those who became inmates of the workhouse, but it could not be denied that there was a social brand upon them. He wished they could get rid of the fear of outdoor relief, which he believed would prevent instead of causing poverty.

MR. ESMONDE said, he objected to the Bill, because it would take the administration of the poor rates out of the hands of the local authorities, and rest in a Central Board of Commissioners at Dublin.

MR. HENNESSY, in reply, maintained that his Bill was identical with the English law in regard to outdoor relief. As to petitions on the subject he found that in 1862 there were 339, each containing a prayer for the assimilation of the law of Ireland to that of England in respect to outdoor relief. He had been supported by the majority of Irish Members who had taken part in the debate but—"Divide!" Well, as there seemed to be a desire that he should go to a division he would do so.

The House divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 201: Majority 177.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

[BILL 18.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SELWYN said, that the absence of opposition to the Bill at that stage must not be regarded as any sanction to it from those who shared his views. The third reading of the Bill would be opposed, and he hoped due notice of the time when the Bill would be set down for that purpose would be given.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3^d on Friday.

[BILL 90.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Repeal of recited Provision and Substitution of amended Provision).

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he wished to know whether "Punch" would be abolished by this Bill?

MR. BASS said, he regarded "Punch" as an institution of the country, which ought on no account to be disturbed.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that "Punch" was generally accompanied by drum and fife, which, under the Bill as it stood, might be removed on account of music.

MR. BASS said, that if the hon. Gentleman would introduce a clause to provide a remedy, it should have his hearty concurrence.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, there was a more stringent clause on the subject in the Police Act.

MR. BRISCOE said, he was in favour of the exemption of that national pastime from the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had got some Amendments on the paper which would improve the Bill, and to which the hon. Member for Derby had no objection. The hon. Gentleman had better submit those Amendments at once.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK moved that after the words—

"Any householder within the metropolitan police district personally, or by his servant, or by any police constable, may require any street musician or singer to depart from the neighbourhood of the house of such householder"—

to insert the words—

"On account of the illness, or on account of the interruption of the ordinary occupations or pursuits of any inmate of such house, or for other reasonable or sufficient cause."

Mr. Schoyn

MR. AYRTON said, that he wished to have a definition of the phrase, "the interruption of the ordinary occupation," and to know who was to be the judge of what constituted an interruption. Was the interpretation to be left to the person who professed to be aggrieved, to the policeman, or to the magistrate? If left to the complainant it might mean anything. "Ordinary occupation" might mean knife cleaning. He was at a loss to discover the principle on which the Bill was based. There was not only the right of the person making complaint to be considered, but the right of the person complained against. The Bill seemed to aim at this—that the owner of a house had a right to regulate what was done within sound of the house. Was that an assertion of the rights of property? Some persons interpreted "rights of property" to mean the most exclusive enjoyment of it; but if the owner of a park so regarded his rights he (Mr. Ayrton) doubted whether such rights would be long respected. If the claim to remove the musicians was based on the rights of property, the Bill ought to be made conformable to the principles on which it was founded, and the owner limited to that which was annoying to him from the front of his own house to the middle of the road. What possible right could a man have to regulate every kind of noise which was within ear-shot? The public street was no more the property of a man than was the house of his neighbour. But if the right of property were not the principle of the Bill what was it? His hon. Friend the Member for Derby had circulated a little volume containing letters which had been addressed to him on the subject. Not only professors and other learned men had communicated with his hon. Friend, but ladies had also written to him, promising him if he would put down street music to play for him any evening, and signing themselves "with kind love, &c., &c." He did not wonder that the hon. Member was not proof against such appeals. Nobody could resist them. The literary Punch was also on the side of his hon. Friend against its dramatic rival, which was nothing without the overture; but a concession, he understood, had been made on that point. It appeared that the gentlemen connected with the literary Punch could not manufacture their jokes when any music was being played. The editor of another journal, whose mission it seemed to be to put an end to all harmony in the political world, was also in favour of prohibiting harmony in the streets. These letters displayed a misanthropic disregard of the feelings of other people. Because some hundred people in the metropolis were of so nervous and sensitive a character that street music did not agree with them, the pleasure of two or three millions were to be interfered with. Persons who were so easily annoyed should not sit at their front windows—if they retired to the back of their houses they would be left in peace. [Mr. BASS: The musicians come both at the front and back of the house.] People who were so sensitive ought not to select houses inconvenient to themselves. The great majority of the houses were not exposed both behind and before; and if in this great metropolis a man required such seclusion he ought to look out for a house specially suited to him, and not apply for a law to enable him to enjoy perfect quietude. There was one much greater annoyance in London than street music, and that was the rolling of carriages. If people were ill they were obliged to take means for preventing the annoyance arising from the noise of carriages; but no one would venture to say that because he was of a nervous temperament carriages should not be allowed to roll by his door. If street music were prohibited the result would be to drive poor people who wished to hear music to the public-houses. That was the case abroad. The law was directed against their servants. How was it that gentlemen who did not encourage street music found it playing before their houses? Why, it was because they kept their domestic servants buried below the surface of the ground. It was easy to understand how delighted these poor buried people must be when having nothing but a vacant area before them, they caught sight of a musician. He never yet saw a wandering Italian looking up at the drawing room window for money. He always looked down to the kitchen window. That being the case with respect to music in private streets, he asked hon. Gentlemen would it be a wise or decent thing to pass a law against these wandering Italians when it would in reality be a law against their domestic servants, who paid the street musicians to play for their amusement. If gentlemen could not control their household it would be better to leave them to the quiet enjoyment which they now possessed, which was no real annoyance to people upstairs unless they were of that sensitive character which rendered every kind of noise an annoyance. The only ground on which anything like a justification could be offered for the measure was the right of property; and, by way of limiting the exercise of that right in accordance with the law, he moved that instead of "near any such house" should be inserted "in front of any such house."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he quite concurred in the opinion that "Punch"—whether the Punch of literature or the "Punch" of the streets—ought to continue to be privileged, for both "Punches" were national institutions. [An hon. MEMBER: With the music?] Certainly with the music. Beyond that, he doubted whether the inhabitants of the Tower Hamlets would agree with their representative. The Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Bentinck) was scarcely worth pressing, as there was no material difference between his proposition and that of the hon. Member for Derby. The question before the House was this—either to leave the law as it stood, or else to enact that every householder should have the absolute right to send away any street music which was annoying or unpleasant. He should be very sorry to get rid of the German bands, for some of them were well worth listening to. He thought, however, that it should be in the discretion of a householder to have everything which he considered an annoyance removed from the front of his dwelling.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he would be the very last to say that any annoyance to a person in front of his house should be allowed to continue against his will, but the Bill was simply ridiculous, since a special exemption was to be inserted in favour of "Punch." The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was in favour of the German bands; then it was to be assumed that he would desire an exemption in their favour. The right hon. Gentleman had a fine ear for music, and he believed had a very fine voice as a vocalist; and he cultivated his taste at the opera. Those who delighted in street music had no opportunity of going to the opera, but they took as much delight in music as those who could pay to listen to a Patti or a Mario. If the Bill was good for the metropolis it would be equally good for Brighton and other large towns, and he saw no reason why London should be selected for special legislation. It had simply been brought forward at the instance of such persons as Mr. Babbage, who was now commencing a crusade against the popular game of tip-cat and the trundling of hoops. Where were they to stop if such a Bill were to pass? They must legislate against the noise of carriages in the streets. He believed if the Bill passed it would be wholly inoperative.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Bill as it originally stood would have enabled any person to remove street music simply because he did not like it, but the Bill as amended would so far alter the existing law only as to enable a householder to object to street music if it interfered with his calling. The existing law was differently interpreted by different magistrates. In the case of Mr. Babbage, it was held by one magistrate that the being engaged in abstruse calculations was reasonable cause for removal, by another it was held that it was not. The Bill, with the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, would remove that uncertainty. It would be left to the magistrate to decide what was a reasonable interference with a person's calling to the satisfaction of the community. No magistrate would say that music could interfere with knife-cleaning, as suggested by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets; but if a gentleman were writing his speech or writing an article a magistrate would hold, on complaint, that street music would be an annoyance. People living in a place like London might be seriously annoyed by disagreeable neighbours without any hope of redress, but there was no reason why they should not be protected against avoidable inconveniences.

MR. BASS said, he quite admitted the principle that property had its duties as well as its rights; but he denied the right of any man to obstruct the public highway, and who could deny that a band of musicians was such an obstruction? An hon. Gentleman told him that he lost a division because his horse refused to pass through a band of German musicians. Again, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was in error in supposing that the complaint against street music only emanated from a few individuals of peculiar idiosyncrasies, who had no feeling of sympathy with the rest of the community. He had received representations on the subject from thousands of persons, including some of the first men in the kingdom, all expressing the hope that the Bill might be passed into law. Among his correspondents were gentlemen who took a great interest in the welfare of the poor; and it was incorrect, therefore, to say that the Bill was opposed by the working classes and their friends. Mr. Charles Dickens was in favour of the Bill, and he had letters from the Poet Laureate, Mr. Carlyle, all the leading artists, and between 300 and 400 of the first musicians of the day, who declared that the interruption caused by street bands rendered it quite impossible to carry on their profession. One of the most distinguished musical geniuses in Europe—a young man—had actually been obliged to give up composing during the day, and was now compelled to work at night. Mr. Tennyson wrote that he was driven from London by street bands, and the late Mr. Thackeray used to say that he had often been glad to take refuge in the fields. It was absurd to pretend that the nuisance of which he complained was kept up for the amusement of the poorer classes. What had poor people to do in Belgrave and Eaton Squares? His hairdresser recently told him that the street bands were encouraged mainly by scullery and nursery maids. Now, he had a great affection for scullery maids, but he must say that they too often poked their heads out of window to listen to street music when they ought to be attending to their work inside. He hoped the House would support the Bill.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he could not help thinking that they were then engaged in peddling legislation. He admitted that some persons suffered from the evils of street music, but there were evils of greater magnitude which no one sought to remove. There were people who suffered from the rolling of carriages at two or three o'clock in the morning, and yet it was not proposed that the practice should be discontinued. He would remind the House that the working classes might have their own opinion upon that subject, but they had no opportunity of expressing that opinion. If music was to be driven out of the streets, some arrangement ought certainly to be made by means of which bands, &c., would be allowed to play in the parks.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that the object of the Bill was merely to give effect to the existing law. The highways were meant for the passage of the Queen's subjects, and street music in them was prima facie illegal. The rolling of carriages, on the other hand, was one of the special objects for which highways were constructed, and there was no analogy between that case and the case contemplated in the present Bill. The most efficient magistrates had always held that personal annoyance was a "reasonable cause" for ordering away a street band, and in that judgment he cordially acquiesced. In its present shape the Bill went no further. A constable could not act under the existing police regulations, and it was time that Parliament should interpose with fresh legislation.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he considered the subject of the Bill was not a fit matter for legislation. Moreover, the Bill was a tyrannical measure, providing for the comfort of the higher classes at the expense of the labouring poor. He would also remind the last speaker that Regent Street was obstructed by long lines of carriages whenever there happened to be anything going on at St. James's Hall.

MR. CLAY said, that several hon. Members seemed to think that the Bill would drive music out of the streets altogether. But such was not the case. By the Bill street music would be only removed from that part of the town where it was not wanted to that part where, according to many hon. Gentlemen, the people were anxious to enjoy it. The existence of nuisances for which a remedy was either difficult or impossible was no reason why the House should not deal with an evil to which a cure might easily be applied. Such was the case with street music, and he hoped the Bill would be passed.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 201; Noes 87: Majority 114.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK then moved to insert in line five, after the word "shillings," "or, in the discretion of the magistrate before whom he shall be convicted, may be imprisoned for any time not more than three days."

Amendment proposed,

In line 5, after the word "shillings," to insert the words "or, in the discretion of the magistrate before whom he shall be convicted, may be imprisoned for any time not more than three days."

—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

MR. BUTT said, he objected to the Amendment, as carrying the penalty for a trifling offence much too far.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he would ask the hon. Member for Taunton, whether the imprisonment proposed was not rather too severe for what, after all, might be a mistake?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he thought the Amendment most reasonable and intended to persevere in it. The term of imprisonment would practically be only one day, because the day on which a man went in and the day he came out were counted.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped the Committee would not sanction the proposal. It would be the first time they had passed a law inflicting imprisonment in lieu of a pecuniary penalty where it was impossible for the person to know at the time that he would be liable to it or not. There was no accurate definition in the Bill by which a man would be able to tell whether he was committing an offence or not. To justify such a punishment the offence ought to be distinct and patent, and not one depending on a nice question about reasonable cause.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that an organ grinder usually had a monkey with him, and he wished to ask whether the hon. Member for Taunton did not intend to make some provision for the monkey when his master went to gaol. Would it be sent to the workhouse?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he thought the monkey should be provided for at the expense of the metropolitan Members.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Amendment gave very little additional power beyond what already existed, because now a magistrate might fine an organ-player 40s., and if the man could not pay he might be sent to prison.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 121; Noes 111: Majority 10.

MR. AYRTON said, they had now come to the last provision of the Bill, which made it lawful for any constable to take into custody, without warrant, any person who should offend as before described. After the alteration which had been made in the former part of the Bill, he thought that provision ought to be struck out. As the Bill originally stood, the householder might ask the musician to go away, and if he did not go away the offence was committed. But since the alteration it was left doubtful until the magistrate had given his decision, whether an offence was committed or not; and did his hon. Friend mean to say that when two persons differed about a doubtful thing one was to take the other into custody? The authors of the Bill ought to rest satisfied with the power of imprisonment for so trivial an offence, and not carry their exceptional legislation any further. He moved the omission of this provision.

Amendment proposed, in line 5, to leave out the words "and it shall be lawful for any constable."—(Mr. Ayrton.)

MR. PEACOCKE said, the chief difficulty of the existing law was, that if a householder ordered a street musician to go away and he refused he had no power to give him into custody, and the only remedy was to summon him. If therefore that part of the Bill was expunged, the law would remain as it was at present. Of what practical use was the remedy of proceeding against an itinerant musician by summons? He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Member for Derby would adhere to the most valuable power of giving the offender into custody.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if he understood the argument of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets it was very strong. The Bill as it originally stood gave the householder absolute power, without any reason, to require a street musician to depart from the neighbourhood of his house, and that then, if the musician refused to depart, the offence was at once complete, and the police constable might immediately take him into custody. But the Amendments that had been introduced essentially altered the character of that part of the Bill. The demand for the street musician's departure was to be effectual law only if it was sustained by reasonable cause, and the reasonable cause was a matter for trial, not by the householder or the police constable, but by the magistrate before whom the musician was taken. It would be an infringement of the principles of liberty if, while the matter might be entirely dependent on the trial before a magistrate, the street musician was at once to undergo a penalty which stopped his means of livelihood, and that at the will or the judgment formed as to reasonable cause by a police constable at eighteen shillings or a guinea a week. He thought there was no doubt that in that part of the Bill they were treading very near to dangerous ground, and that the Bill would be much improved if they adopted the suggestion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. MALINS said, he apprehended that the Bill would be deprived of all its efficacy if the recommendation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were adopted. The object of the measure was to give the householder a summary remedy, and avoid the necessity of his going about to find where an itinerant musician lived in order to summon him. That Bill had been called "tyrannical;" but how was it to be compared with the tyranny of these wandering people, who, as the law now stood, at their will and pleasure might come under a man's window and render his house uninhabitable? It was necessary that the inhabitants of this great town should be armed with a summary power of abating a nuisance which had been allowed to continue too long, and as that was the essence of the Bill, he trusted that the hon. Member for Derby would not surrender it.

MR. LOCKE said, he thought there was a great defect in the clause. Let them take an analogy from the Game Laws. If a man was found on the land of another committing a trespass, and armed, he could not be taken into custody or removed from that land until certain questions were put to him and certain statements made to him; and it was necessary that all that should be proved in a court of law. As the Bill had been altered, a street musician was to be required to move away for a reasonable cause, such as the illness of an inmate or some other ground; but the words of the clause would not render it necessary that the street musician should be told the reason why he was ordered away before he could be taken into custody.

MR. BASS said, his hon. and learned Friend was mistaken in the matter. The Bill had certainly been altered to some extent in deference to the suggestions of the Home Secretary, but if the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets were to be adopted, why they had better all go home. The language of the clause was perfectly consistent, and he hoped the Committee would agree to it.

MR. BUTT moved that the Chairman then report Progress.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Butt.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 175: Majority 121.

Amendment again proposed.

MR. BUTT said, there was another provision in the clause besides that of a person being ill or being disturbed in his occupation, and that was that a musician might be taken into custody for other sufficient and reasonable cause. Now, surely that was much too indefinite, for under such a provision a person might be kept in custody from Monday to Saturday, and it might then be discovered that no sufficient or reasonable cause had been assigned.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, it was something quite new to propose that such extraordinary confidence should be placed in a policeman by giving him this arbitrary power.

MR. AYRTON said, that to give a constable the power of taking a person into custody was practically to withhold from him any remedy.

SIR GEORGE GREY observed, that if the words proposed to be left out were omitted the law would remain as at present. Offenders could only be proceeded against by summons, and when summoned to appear before a magistrate they could not be found. But he was aware of no case in which a constable had power to apprehend a person under the Metropolitan Police Act unless the offence were committed within his view. He should move afterwards the insertion of the words "within view of such constable."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, in cases of annoyance under the Bill, the difficulty would be to find a policeman, and when he was brought to the spot the street musician would not be playing on his instrument, but probably sitting on the doorway of the householder, so that the constable could not act.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that in an assault case, it was not necessary for the officer to see the assault; it was sufficient if he perceived marks upon the person complaining.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 151; Noes 68: Majority 83.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would then propose the insertion of the words "within the view of such constable."

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "within view of such constable."—(Sir George Grey.)

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he should oppose the Amendment. He was greatly surprised at the quarter from which this Amendment proceeded.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, unless the words "within the view of such constable" were inserted, the constable would be called upon to act upon the mere allegation of the householder, which would be totally unprecedented and exceptional.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 118: Majority 35.

House resumed.

ABOLITION OF METROPOLITAN TURNPIKES.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD RAVENSWORTH wished to call their Lordships' attention to the fact that a great social reform would take place that evening in the metropolis—that the long-standing grievance, not to say nuisance, of the metropolis, the metropolitan suburban tolls, ceased at once and for ever in the northern districts. This was no small boon to the public. He was old enough to recollect when a turnpike-gate interposed at Hyde Park, and also at the Marble Arch. Her Majesty's subjects might now travel from the heart of the City to the furthest extremity of the metropolis, without obstruction, and without being robbed, he might say, by the licensed tax gatherer. It had been his lot to present several memorials to the Government and many petitions to that House upon the subject; and he thought that great thanks were due to a noble Earl, not then in his place, for originating the movement for their abolition, and he begged to express his satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government carried out the recommendations of the Royal Commission that had inquired into the subject. He, therefore, asked the noble Earl the President of the Council, What arrangements Her Majesty's Government had made in substitution of the tolls to effect this improvement; and, secondly, whether every suburb of the metropolis was to enjoy the same liberty?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he shared the satisfaction of the noble Lord at the great improvement that had been effected, but required time to obtain the necessary information required by the noble Lord. He would give the noble Lord a satisfactory answer on a future occasion.

LONDON CITY TITHES BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

LORD TAUNTON noticed that it occupied a similar position to the Brokers Bonds Bill, which had been postponed in consequence of its being introduced as a Private Bill instead of a Public one.

LORD REDESDALE admitted the force of the objection, and would not oppose the postponement of the Order.

Further Debate, and Second Reading, put off to Monday next.

SECOND READING. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that the subject was one which had been much discussed of late in newspapers and periodicals. He was in no way connected with the description of property to which it related, but the investigations which he had some years ago made on the subject had led him to the conclusion that it was one which was well deserving the attention of Parliament. He had, therefore, endeavoured to frame a Bill dealing with the subject on a principle which he thought ought to be adopted; but he was happy to think that the Government were prepared to take the matter into their own hands. With the view of showing their Lordships the importance of the interests concerned, he would refer their Lordships to a book which had been published by the Irish Fishery Commissioners, from which he found that in the Whitstable fishery and adjoining grounds, which consisted of 12 square miles of public grounds and 15 of private, in all 27 square miles, 3,270 persons earned a daily livelihood, and from 800 to 850 dredging boats were employed. The average wages received by the 3,270 men engaged in the fishery were 20s. a week throughout the year. The amount paid in wages, he might add, by the owners of private beds at Whitstable in one year amounted to £125,500, the amount paid by the Essex local beds being £35,000, making a total of £160,500 expended in wages yearly. If to that were added the money spent in keeping the boats in repair—the sums paid to smiths, shipwrights, sail and ropemakers, amounting to £17,000; the expenditure for old boats and those lost in storms amounting to £4,500—the total outlay would be found to be £182,000 on the 27 square miles to which he referred. To show how matters stood in a smaller locality, he might state that at the Arklow oyster fishery the number of barrels of oysters caught and sold from the 14th of January to the 26th of May, 1863, was 34,038, the value being £10,830. Of these 2,860 went to the Welsh coast, 2,600 to France, 20,500 to the Kentish coast, and the remainder to the Irish coast. It was stated on the same authority that between £20,000 and £30,000 was paid annually to Jersey for oysters to breed, while Queensborough on the Thames paid sometimes to Granville, on the French coast, from £1,500 to £2,000 for oyster spat. The prices for oysters for laying down in beds had, he might add, risen in the case of the Channel ridge from 3s. and 3s. 6d. per bushel in 1859 to 7s. and 9s. in the present year; while in the case of Falmouth and the Southampton waters the prices had risen from 1s. to 1s. 6d., which was the rate up to 1858, to from 15s. to 20s. in 1864. The subject was one, he might further observe, in which the French Government had taken a great interest with the view of encouraging the fishermen and increasing the productive powers of the country. He held in his hand a statement which had been made before the Committee on the Herne Bay Fishery Bill, which showed that at the Isle de Rhé in 1858 there was not a single oyster on the shore, whereas there were now 3,063 oyster beds in full work or being completed, containing 100,000,000 oysters valued at more than £50,000, and giving employment to 1,700 men. He had also a statement of the development of an oyster bed of the extent of one acre, situated in the Thames Estuary, capable of producing a good quality of natives, and stocked with 1,000 bushels of oysters of 1,600 each, which showed an increase in value in four years of from £256 to £12,500. He proposed to follow the plan adopted in Ireland of granting a licence to persons to establish oyster beds, and that that licence should be obtained under the authority of the Board of Trade, which would of course previously make the requisite inquiry. As the Government had issued a Royal Commission to inquire into this subject he did not wish to proceed further than the second reading, which would affirm the principle of the Bill.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.—(The Marquess of Clanricarde.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was glad that the noble Marquess did not intend to press the Bill this Session, as some of its details appeared to him objectionable. Indeed he thought that the second reading should not take place. It was better, he thought, to wait until the Report of the Royal Commission was laid before them, which would furnish them with information on which to act.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY also thought it was premature to attempt to legislate before the Report of the Royal Commission was laid before them.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE expressed a similar opinion.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he would withdraw the Motion for the second reading.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn; and Bill (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

AGRARIAN OUTRAGES (IRELAND).

RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE, in rising to move the Resolution of which he had given notice, said, he felt considerable diffidence in bringing this subject forward, because he felt the difficulty of treating so important a matter in the manner it deserved. He brought the subject under their Lordships' attention in no spirit of hostility to the noble Earl who held the office of Lord Lieutenant, for whom in his social position he had the greatest possible regard and affection. But he should be wanting in frankness if he did not say—and he was not alone in thinking so—that Lord Carlisle had shown in the government of Ireland a want of prudence and of firmness in resisting improper pressure. Nothing would induce him to bring this subject forward if he had not a strong conviction that the Lord Lieutenant's decision in releasing certain convicted prisoners had aggravated the unfortunate position in which many parts of the country stood. During the viceroyalty of the noble Marquess, now no more, (the Marquess of Normanby) he made a sort of Royal progress through the country and released prisoners by hundreds. The result of that policy was fully disclosed before the Committee of 1839, and it was shown to be most injurious to the peace of the country. To come to a later period—in Westmeath the Riband Society was flourishing, and some extracts from charges of the Judges who had held Her Majesty's assize for that county would best illustrate the position of affairs there. At the summer assizes of 1859 Chief Justice Monahan said—

“He regretted that, although the calendar was very light in point of numbers, he could not congratulate them upon the state of the county. It was lamentable that since he had the honour of addressing them last, a most barbarous murder had been committed in their county, under circumstances of great atrocity. The crime was perpetrated in the presence of several persons, and the assassin, who must have been known, had not yet been made amenable to justice. It was a shocking thing that one of the bills that would be laid before them had reference to a threatening notice that had been sent to the wife of the man who had been murdered. He need not say that when such a state of things existed in their county it was most important that every magistrate and gentleman of property should do all in his power to aid in the administration of justice, for until such men as he saw before him co-operated in putting an end to such crimes and disturbances as at present disgraced them, they could not hope to restore tranquillity to their fine county.”

The Chief Justice here threw blame upon the magistrates and grand jurors, as though they had not performed their duty. Now, the fault did not lie with them, but with the Irish Government, who had released culprits justly convicted and sentenced. At the Spring Assizes for 1860 Mr. Justice Keogh charged the grand jury in these words—

“Although the number of prisoners upon the calendar which has been laid before me is not large, I am sorry I am not able to say, from the information I have obtained, that the condition of the county is satisfactory; the very reverse is the fact. The number of cases upon the calendar is only seven, but when we look to the character of those cases, four being murder and two for assaults so as to endanger life, it is impossible to abstain from the expression of the opinion that the condition of the people of this county is anything but desirable.”

He wished to show that the condition of the county was not the result of a sudden outbreak of agrarian outrage, but had long existed, and that for years this war of ribandism against life and property had continued in the county. At the Summer Assizes in 1862 Chief Justice Monahan said—

“I sincerely wish that the calendar before me could be taken as an index of the state of your county. If such were the case, it would be a matter of sincere congratulation, but I regret to find that it is not. Since my arrival in town I have been furnished by the county inspector and other officials with a return of the offences committed in the county since last assizes, and this return shows that, in a very large number of cases, the perpetrators have escaped detection. There are twelve or fourteen instances where parties have been served with threatening notices, and in not one of these have the authors been discovered. There are several cases of malicious injury also, for which not a single person has been made amenable. There is a repugnance evinced by the persons aggrieved to aid the authorities in the detection of the guilty parties. This repugnance—whether caused by fear, intimidation, or otherwise—I consider, in a great measure accounts for the non-discovery of the perpetrators of crime.”

There was a remarkable case in connection with a small property belonging to a gentleman named Smith. This gentleman was obliged to evict a tenant or tenants. The first tenant put in, a man named Kelly, was murdered. His murderers had never been detected, and no one had been punished. The next tenant named Jessop, was also murdered, and while he was lying dead a threatening letter was sent to his widow. No one was convicted of either of these crimes, though the murder was committed in broad daylight. Suspicion, however, fell upon a man who was very fortunately convicted shortly afterwards of a malicious assault, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. But, in spite of his known character, he was not allowed to spend the full period of his sentence in prison, but was released six months before his term had expired. A magistrate of the neighbourhood, having ascertained this fact, wrote to the Chief Secretary of Ireland, desiring to learn the cause of his release. He received the following answer from Sir Robert Peel:—

“Dublin Castle, Oct. 17, 1861.

“Dear Sir,—I have made inquiries respecting the case of Darby Grehon, committed March, 1860, by Judge Keogh, for malicious assault, and sentenced to two years' hard labour. I find that this prisoner was discharged August 16 of this present year, consequently with six months of his sentence unexpired. You expressed a no doubt well grounded alarm at the premature release of this convict, particularly as you were under the impression that Judge Keogh had announced in court that he regretted to be unable to pass a more severe sentence than the one recorded. I find, however, that it was upon Judge Keogh's own special recommendation that this prisoner was discharged last August, on the plea that the prisoner was a very poor man when convicted, and that the state of the county of Westmeath is much improved. I would venture to recommend that you should direct the police to have a vigilant eye upon this man, so as to afford him no opportunity of further disturbance of the peace.

"I am, yours faithfully,
"G. A. Boyd, Esq." "ROBERT PEARL.

That was the excuse urged by the Chief Secretary for the release of a man who had been discharged, certainly without any communication with the local magistrates. He had another case to bring forward, which would show the manner in which the Irish Government were in the habit of dealing with offenders. Their Lordships knew how difficult was the detection of persons in possession of passwords of illegal societies. A conviction in such cases was almost impossible. A man named Martin Fallon, however, was convicted of this offence at the Spring Assizes of 1859, and in passing sentence upon him Chief Justice Monahan said—

"Martin Fallon, you have been found guilty of having in your possession the passwords of an illegal society, knowing them to be such, without being able to account satisfactorily for the same. It has been proved that this unlawful conspiracy exists, and is widely spread throughout Ireland. If one thing is calculated more than another to do injury to the peace of the country, it is the existence of this abominable society. I entertain no shadow of a doubt whatever that you had the copy of those passwords in your possession solely and expressly for the purpose of disseminating them through the country. Of that I am quite as certain as I can be of anything of which I have not actual knowledge. Therefore it becomes my duty to pass upon you the most severe sentence which the law allows me to do. I am quite convinced that if there be any one thing more injurious to men in your class of life than another it is the existence of such illegal combinations and confederacies. It happens, unfortunately for those who wish to carry out their illegal designs, that their power to do mischief will be of temporary duration. The law at present in force has not reached the combination which at present exists in the country to its fullest extent; but the day is fast approaching when there will be evidence sufficient to reach such persons. As you were implicated in several crimes before you went to America, and on your return you have again commenced the same course of conduct, under these circumstances the sentence of the Court is, that you suffer seven years' penal servitude."

A friend of his, a magistrate of the county of Westmeath, to his astonishment saw this man walking about a short time since, and so strong was his impression that the Government would not release a man of such a stamp, that he thought he must have been mistaken, and determined to write to the governor of the gaol to ascertain whether the man was still in prison. The governor, in his reply, stated that the man had been released upon a ticket-of-leave. The man might now possibly have resumed his old employment, and be persuading people to join these illegal societies. He had no doubt that it might be said that the prisoner had behaved very well while in prison, and had given such satisfaction to the authorities that he had been released before his time. He maintained, however, that such a man ought to have been sent to Western Australia, for the only way to suppress those conspiracies was to show no mercy whatever. He now came to the case of which he had given notice. It referred to the case of a man named Kelly, who had been living at Moate, and the injuries which he had suffered had been thus detailed in a letter which he had received from an inhabitant of the place—

"In March last an office of Kelly's, with eleven head of good cattle, was maliciously burned, and he believes the reason to be his having let a garden to the Doulans, which had for many years previously been in the possession of a family named Costello. For this offence against the Riband code Doulan's house was attacked by an armed party in 1862, among whom were the Duigans and Egan. Early in 1863 another house on Kelly's land was maliciously burned. They have never ceased persecuting him since he let the garden to the Doulans."

He understood that the defence of the Lord Lieutenant's conduct would rest upon the fact that there was some doubt as to the identity of the prisoners, Michael Duigan, Patrick Egan, and Patrick Duigan; but the evidence of Ann Doulan was conclusive upon this point. The defence for the prisoners was one often employed by the guilty, an alibi—and he must say that he had always found an alibi in case of failure to be the very worst defence that could possibly be set up. He could not conceive any case more clear as to guilt. The learned Judge in passing sentence promised them that he would inflict the heaviest punishment in his power, and he kept his word, having no fault to find with the verdict of the jury. Under these circumstances it was important to know why these three men were let out of prison. It appeared that the Lord Lieutenant received two memorials. He received one memorial in March, 1863, from one of the prisoners, Michael Duigan, the only one who had ever so asked for a remission of the punishment. That person in his memorial stated some things which were not true. Of course he denied his guilt—as every Irishman who was ever accused had done—but he went on to state that he had an aged father and a mother dependent on him for support. The Lord Lieutenant was not aware that that statement was untrue, but he took no steps to ascertain whether it was true or false. If he had made inquiries, he would have found that Duigan's father possessed eight or ten cottages and was in a very comfortable position. That memorial was backed by the recommendations of forty-seven persons living at Moate; but the names of only two of these were printed by the Government, as the Castle authorities were ashamed of the other forty-five. He had some information as to the characters of those persons, and he was informed by an inhabitant of that town that "the memorial was signed by a class of persons that the Government were ashamed of." Thus, among the signers there was a draper and spirit dealer, a baker and spirit dealer, a grocer and whisky seller, a baker and whisky dealer, &c. It was noticeable that no Return had been made, according to the order of the House, of the communications which accompanied the memorial. Upon that memorial no steps were taken, but they were not informed whether the Chief Justice was communicated with. The answer to that memorial it appeared was not favourable, for a second was presented in February last. That memorial was signed by Mr. Berry, a Baptist minister. Respecting that gentleman he had received some information which it was well the House should possess. It appeared that Mr. Berry, although an excellent man, entertained some very curious notions about punishments and rewards, thinking that temporal punishments were altogether wrong, and that offences committed in this world should be left to the awful punishment of a dreadful hereafter. These notions might be very amiable in a Baptist minister, but they were not such as should animate persons who had to deal with offences committed in this world, or else it would be better at once to abolish our criminal code of laws. That memorial was supported by Mr. William Greene, who was described as agent to a large landed proprietor. Mr. Greene's own description of himself was that he was not agent to any one, but that he farmed forty-two acres of land; and an inhabitant of Moate, who had furnished him (the Earl of Donoughmore) with information, described Greene as "One of the Rev. Mr. Berry's congregation, and being the only Protestant in the neighbourhood, he lost no opportunity of interfering in such matters by way of gaining popularity."

The Earl of Donoughmore

This memorial being received on the 10th of February, the men were released on the 16th. Having shown how these memorials had been got up, and the manner in which they had been received, he had to complain that upon neither of those memorials had the Lord Lieutenant consulted any person connected with the locality. The Lord Lieutenant knew that there were magistrates and grand jurors acquainted with the district, from whom he could have ascertained the character of the persons who signed the memorials. In fact, the noble Earl seemed to have been guided by a statement in Mr. Berry's letter—

"That he had always used his influence for the deterring of crime, and that influence he had felt it a privilege to give to the present Liberal Government."

Perhaps that was the reason why Mr. Berry succeeded in his application to the Lord Lieutenant—that kind of soft sawder might have blinded the noble Earl—but still he ought to have taken some precautions before interfering with the verdict of a jury and the award of a Judge. Within a few days afterwards Kelly's offices were burnt down. Only one of the three prisoners remained in the country, and when he found that the police were making inquiries he ran off, affording very fair ground for the presumption that he had taken part in the outrage. The murder took place a few days afterwards. An old man, assisted by his son, had taken a small piece—two acres—of land. This was against the decree of the secret society. A party of men came in open day, beat the unfortunate son, and left him dying. There must have been plenty of witnesses; but there was the greatest difficulty in getting any one to speak to the facts. These were the outrages which were going on in the county where the Lord Lieutenant was amusing himself with his gaol deliveries. The Lord Lieutenant was not satisfied in letting one of the prisoners out. Two of them by their silence admitted the justice of their sentence; but the Lord Lieutenant was so generous a man that he released the whole three prisoners. Such proceedings might be very amusing to the Lord Lieutenant, but they were ruin to property, to the security of life, and all the best interests of the country. They required a man of courage and determination—a man with a firm hand—in the position of the Lord Lieutenant, and that they certainly had not in Ireland at the present moment. The noble Marquess concluded by moving to resolve—

"That, considering the Extent to which Agrarian Outrages prevail in certain Counties in Ireland, and the Difficulty which exists in obtaining Convictions for Offences of this Description, this House is of Opinion that the Power of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to remit the whole or a Portion of the Sentences of Persons convicted of such Crimes should be exercised with greater Care and Circumspection; and this House observes with Regret that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ordered the Release of Michael Duigan, Patrick Duigan, and Patrick Egan, Prisoners under Sentence for an Agrarian Offence, confined in the County Gaol of Westmeath, upon Grounds which appear to be insufficient."

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have listened with attention to the long and, I admit, perfectly clear and very carefully-prepared speech of the noble Earl. His Motion is one certainly of importance, and, I may add, of an unusual character. The object of the Motion is to invite this House indirectly to interfere with the discretion with which the Royal prerogative of mercy is exercised, and that this House will agree to a strong personal and severe censure upon the person to whom is delegated the exercise of the Royal prerogative in Ireland. I am quite sure that nothing would induce your Lordships to agree to such a Motion unless it could be shown, and could not be contradicted, that there had been a very gross want of discretion in the administration of that prerogative, or that the person exercising it had been influenced by some corrupt motives. Now, with regard to that, the noble Earl began with a very just eulogium on the Lord Lieutenant; but the fault he imputed to him was this—he was too subject to pressure in the exercise of his duties. Now, I certainly am relieved to find that part of the charge brought forward by the noble Earl has been so entirely abandoned; for, so far from political pressure being imputed, the noble Earl said the memorial to the Lord Lieutenant was only signed by persons in a small town in Ireland, whom the noble Earl spoke of with the greatest contempt, because they were only Baptist ministers, grocers, and persons of no influence whatever. The noble Earl enlarged at considerable length on a topic well calculated to affect the feelings of your Lordships, with regard to agrarian outrage in the county of Westmeath—a subject of the greatest importance and sincere concern to Her Majesty's Government. But the question, as I consider, turns on a very different issue. The noble Earl gave no particular instance of the misguided clemency on the part of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and then claimed for himself credit for the fairness with which he gave both public and private notice of his intention in regard to this debate. I did not know what the cases were to which he would refer; but see now what they amount to. In one case, on the recommendation of the Judge, the Lord Lieutenant released the prisoner; and in another the prisoner was not released by the Lord Lieutenant at all, but was released on a ticket-of-leave. Then, with regard to the particular case with which he had to deal, the prisoners had been in gaol for upwards of nineteen months out of the twenty-four for which they were sentenced. The Lord Lieutenant referred to the Report of the case by Chief Justice Monahan. That learned Judge gave an account of the trial. I regret extremely that I cannot read it to your Lordships to show the sort of evidence which was brought forward, but I will show it to any one who desires to see it. There were three rooms in the house—an inner room, where there was a girl; the second, in which was the father; and the other, in which were the two brothers. The girl stated that she saw the three prisoners and identified them. The two brothers did not identify them. An alibi was proved. The noble Earl spoke with great contempt of an alibi, and of course it must depend entirely on the facts proved. But what does Chief Justice Monahan say on that point? He said this, "I certainly considered it a case of considerable difficulty, and I really do not know what I should have found if I had been on the jury." I think that casts a great deal of doubt upon the case, and I think the case of these unfortunate men, who had been so long in prison, was in these circumstances a very fair one for the exercise of the Royal prerogative of mercy. The noble Earl complained very much that the local magistracy had not been consulted. I am surprised that complaint should have been made after what was said in this House the other evening in the course of a debate that neither in Ireland nor in England were the magistrates consulted in such cases, except where the chairman of Quarter Sessions was the Judge. Why it should be made a matter of reproach that the Lord Lieutenant did not depart from a practice universal both in Ireland and in England I really cannot conceive. The noble Earl went on to show that two of these men had not been guilty of some very atrocious crime, but left the country, and the third, fearing he might get into difficulties again, took himself off as soon as he could. That is a very short statement of the facts. I do not think your Lordships will feel that this is a case for this House to interfere in so unusual a manner as the noble Earl proposes. I cannot believe the noble Earl will be disposed to press his Motion to a division, but if he does I am perfectly confident your Lordships will not support it.

THE DUKE OF LEINSTER inquired whether the noble Earl intended to divide the House.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM expressed his hope that his noble Friend would divide the House, for the matter which had been brought before them was one which was of a very serious character, and the lives of the people ought not to be trifled with as they had been lately. [The noble Earl addressed further remarks to the House which were very imperfectly heard.] As the House, however, was impatient for a division, he would not do more than express his opinion that there was not a proper desire upon the part of the Government in Ireland to promote the welfare of that country. Sub-inspectors of police were put upon the bench, commoners were put over the heads of Peers, and everything was done to degrade the gentry in their counties.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that his noble Friend had said that the House was impatient for a division; but he (Lord Chelmsford) must say that he never saw a House more impatient not to come to a division. When he came down to the House he had no knowledge of the facts upon which the Motion was to be founded. He had listened very attentively to the speech of his noble Friend (the Earl of Donoughmore), and he was satisfied that it had not been made out that there had been an improper exercise of leniency or any improper interference with the course of justice on the part of the Lord Lieutenant, in carrying out the very delicate duty of dispensing the mercy of the Crown. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the Motion would not be pressed to a division.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he would withdraw his Motion; but that he did not regret having brought the matter forward, because he felt very strongly in reference to it, and he thought that but a weak defence had been made. He hoped that more care would be exercised in future.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

ADDRESS FOR A PAPER.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM moved That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for

"1. Copy of the Informations of Theresa Keenan, taken before J. Tyrell Byrne, Esquire, J. P., at Drumsna, in the county of Leitrim, on the 2nd day of April, 1864, relative to some Windows being broken at Eskeragh alias Esker South, in the Parish of Mohill, Barony of Mohill, and County of Leitrim, between the 24th and 30th days of March, 1864: Also,

"2. Copy of the Police Reports and Correspondence relative to the breaking of the above-mentioned Windows, and the taking of the said Theresa Keenan by the Police before a Magistrate: And also,

"3. Copy of the Warrant, if any, authorizing the police to take the said Theresa Keenan before a magistrate."

The noble Earl stated the substance of his charge against the police to be that they had gone into the bed-room of Theresa Keenan, who was a schoolmistress, had cross-questioned her there, and had afterwards forcibly taken her before a police magistrate; though all she could say when there was that she did not know who it was that broke the windows. He also asserted that repeated outrages were committed by the police in Ireland, and instanced the annoyances to which he had himself been subjected. It might be said that he should communicate with the Government in Ireland; but that was impossible after what had happened. It was the fashion to say that the Lord Lieutenant was a good-natured and kind-hearted man; but he (the Earl of Leitrim) looked upon him as a traitor to his Queen, his religion, and his country.

EARL GRANVILLE declined to defend the conduct of his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant against the assertions which had been made. He had no objection to produce the informations; correspondence there was none; it was not the custom to produce police reports; and warrant there was none, for the young woman had gone before the magistrate voluntarily.

Earl Granville

THE EARL OF LEITRIM asserted that it was utterly untrue that she had gone voluntarily; for he had positive information that she was taken after repeated remonstrances on her part.

Motion for an Address for

"Copy of the Informations of Theresa Keenan, taken before J. Tyrell Byrne, Esquire, J. P., at Drumsna, in the County of Leitrim, on the 2nd day of April, 1864, relative to some Windows being broken at Eakeragh alias Eaker South, in the Parish of Mohill, Barony of Mohill, and County of Leitrim, between the 24th and 30th days of March, 1864."

Agreed to.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM moved for

"Return of the Names of Prisoners under Sentence and discharged from the several Gaols or Convict Prisons in Ireland before the Expiration of their Sentences, or whose Sentences have been commuted by the Order of the Government in Ireland, during the Years 1859, 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864; showing the Nature of the Crime for which each was convicted, the Sentence of the Court, and the Grounds upon which the Release or Commutation has taken place."

EARL GRANVILLE said, he could not agree to the Motion; the Returns would be very troublesome and expensive to prepare, and would be quite useless.

On Question, Resolved in the Negative.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

CANADA—DEFENCES OF QUEBEC.

QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether orders having been sent for concentrating a large British force at Quebec, steps are also being taken to put that place in a defensible state?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that what he had stated was that orders had been sent to Montreal and Quebec to concentrate the forces. With regard to the fortifications of the Colony, the Secretary of State for War had recently received from Canada a Report as to the state of the defences. That Report was now under the consideration of the military authorities; but his noble Friend (Earl de Grey) was not prepared to announce any determination upon it at present.

ARMY—BARRACK MASTERS.

QUESTION.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether a Barrack Master has recently been promoted from the Fourth Class to the Second Class without having served in the Third Class the period laid down by the Royal Warrant of 7th February, 1860?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied that no Barrack Master had been promoted in the manner indicated by the question; but Captain Forbes, a Barrack Master of the Second Class, having retired before the issue of the Warrant of 1860, had, at his own request, been recently reinstated in his position as Barrack Master in that rank.

TRAFFIC ON WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has inquired as to the traffic on Westminster Bridge, and will state the reason why the Police do not interfere in the regulation of the traffic, so as to divide the heavy from the fast traffic, there being Tramways laid down on the Bridge, which must tend to facilitate regulations which have had the best results on London Bridge?

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, he wished to know whether there would be any objection to take up the Tramways, seeing that they only obstructed the traffic over the Bridge?

MR. COWPER said, in reply, that the tramways were intended to separate the slow and heavy traffic from the fast and light traffic. He differed from his hon. Friend (Sir Joseph Paxton) in regard to the alleged inconvenience of the tramways. It was the interest of the drivers of the slow and heavy traffic to go on the tramway, because the draught was easier for the horses. It was obviously for the interest of the drivers of slow and quick vehicles to accommodate themselves to the arrangement, and he believed they generally did so. Two policemen were usually stationed on the bridge, and they reported that no obstruction of a serious character had taken place, so as to justify their interference. The police had no legal authority to compel reluctant persons to go along the tramway except on account of obstruction. They could point out that it was for the general convenience that the light and heavy traffic should be kept separate, and he had no reason to believe they had failed in their duty in that respect.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries as to the traffic regulations of London Bridge, and see whether the same regulations cannot be adopted at Westminster Bridge?

MR. COWPER said, that there was no tramway on London Bridge. The rule there was that the light and heavy traffic going in the same direction should take a particular side of the bridge. If that direction were not strictly observed an obstruction would arise. The police had authority to interfere the moment an obstruction occurred or when they had reason to apprehend that an obstruction would arise. There had been no such obstruction hitherto on Westminster Bridge as would justify any exercise of authority on the part of the police.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would suggest that if the police had no legal power at present to regulate the traffic the right hon. Gentleman would do well to confer with the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and see if some means could not be devised to give them that most necessary authority.

THE LADIES' GALLERY.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, for the purpose of providing for the due ventilation and comfort of the Ladies' Gallery, he will give directions for the removal of the grating in front of that Gallery?

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I should like to know whether, instead of the removal of the grating in the front of the Gallery, he could not remove one of the panels from behind to allow of ventilation?

MR. COWPER: I have, Sir, already done what is in my power to promote the comfort of the ladies by improving the ventilation by an outlet in the ceiling in that part of the House in which they are allowed to sit. But the question of the hon. Baronet opens up another matter which is not within my province. He wishes to remove a grating which I suppose he thinks is of a too conventual character for this House. I remember that some years ago this subject was very generally discussed in this House, and many hon. Members maintained that if there was an open and visible gallery for the reception of the ladies, the influence exercised by that gallery over the proceedings of the House would be such as not to be altogether desirable. It was determined that it would be better that the House should not be exposed to such an influence. Until the House has pronounced a different opinion, I must decline to remove that conventual grating, which has its uses, for it enables persons behind it to see, without being seen.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the House of Lords ladies sit in an open gallery without any grating at all? And is this House likely to be influenced by the ladies when they do no harm in the House of Lords?

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

GRANTS TO ENDOWED SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, who had given notice to move—

"That in the opinion of this House the mode in which it is proposed by the Minute of the 11th day of March, 1864, to make Grants to Endowed Schools, and the distinction made by the same Minute between Endowed Schools in the country and in towns, are unsatisfactory and unjust."

said, it had been intimated to him that a Motion, similar in substance and effect, having been moved by his right hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley), and decided by the House, it was a serious question whether it was competent to him, consistently with the rules of the House, which forbade making the same Motion twice in the same Session, to move the Resolution which stood on the paper in his name. He, therefore, begged to ask for an authoritative decision from the Chair, whether it would be in his power to make the Motion or not?

MR. SPEAKER: According to the rules of the House, no Question or Amendment may be proposed which is the same in substance as any question which during the same Session has been resolved in the affirmative or negative. The original Minute of Council deducted the amount of the endowment from the grant in all cases. The amended Minute of the 11th of March made no deduction from small rural schools, but withdrew the grant from the schools in towns. The right hon. Member for Staffordshire objected to this amended Minute and to this distinction between town and country schools, and on the 2nd of June moved a Resolution in these words—

"That this House, having considered the Minute of Council of the 11th day of March, 1864, on Endowed Schools, is of opinion that it does not meet the objections made to the Minute of the 19th day of May, 1863."

This Motion was negatived. To-day the right hon. Member for Droitwich proposes a Resolution—

"That in the opinion of this House the mode in which it is proposed by the Minute of the 11th of March to make grants to Endowed Schools, and the distinction made by the same Minute between Endowed Schools in the country and in towns, is unsatisfactory and unjust."

I have not been able to arrive at any other conclusion than that this Resolution is the same in substance, as it is very nearly the same in terms, as the Resolution of the right hon. Member for North Staffordshire, which was resolved in the negative, and that it could not be put without a contravention of the rules of the House.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON bowed to the decision of the Chair. He had not the least disposition to oppose the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman, and he thought the House would agree with him that he would be unnecessarily intruding on their time if he entered into any argument on the Question. But before he retired from the Question, there was one remark that he desired to offer, and that was that distinctly for himself, and he believed he might say for many Members of the House, he entirely refused to admit that the decision of the House was a final decision of the Question. The division was a very narrow one, the majority being only eight or nine; it was taken unexpectedly; and it could not, in any sense, be considered as testing the opinion of the House upon the subject. In his opinion, the policy of the Government with regard to Endowed Schools was unrighteous and unwise, and he thought that if any hon. Member would refer to that part of the Report of the Royal Commission which related to the establishment of these Endowed Schools he could only arrive at the conclusion, that if we had an Educational Department, with a responsible Minister at its head, it would be impossible for that Minister not to feel that it would be his duty to avail himself of the endowments, in order to improve and extend education throughout many districts of the country, and not to lend himself to the unworthy policy of saving a few thousands of the annual charge at the expense of impeding the education of the people. While, then, he bowed to the decision pronounced by the Speaker, he thought it impossible that this subject could be left where it was; and in the next Session of Parliament he intended himself, unless it was done by some other hon. Member, to revive the discussion, and induce the House of Commons to reverse its decision.

SCHOOL OF NAVAL ARCHITECTURE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, it would be in the recollection of the House, that on the discussion of the Navy Estimates a Vote was taken with reference to the proposed school, and that he, with other Members, objected, not to the establishment of such a school, for which he believed there were cogent reasons, but to the place in which it was intended to locate it. Since then he had made exertions at different times to get certain papers, especially a document by Sir W. Snow Harris, which had been submitted to the Admiralty, and laid upon the table of the House; but the noble and gallant Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty objected on the ground that it was the production of a private person, and ought not to be printed at the public expense. Certain documents, however, had been laid upon the table, which, though exceedingly incomplete, fully confirmed the objections to the establishment of the school at South Kensington. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) had taken credit to himself for having been the first to propose the scheme to the Admiralty; but on looking back to the papers he found that the first document on the subject was from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, and was dated January 13, while the paper transmitted by the right hon. Baronet was dated the 12th of March following. But the right hon. Baronet probably intended to refer to what had taken place in the Institution of Naval Architects, of which he was president, and before which a paper was read last year by Mr. Scott Russell with reference to the establishment of such a school. He must do Mr. Scott Russell the justice to say that it was to him the scheme was justly to be ascribed. Last March twelve months Mr. Scott Russell read a paper to the Institution of Naval Architects, in which he pointed out what had been done in France in the matter, and expressed an opinion that such a school, if established at all, ought to be in this metropolis. But if hon. Members considered what the Ecole Polytechnique was, and the difference between it and the Museum at South Kensington, they would see that there were no grounds whatever for establishing such a school at the latter place. A report was subsequently made to the same institution by Dr. Woolley, in which he alleged that there were thirteen grounds upon which the school ought to be established. Dr. Woolley said, that half the time, or three days in the week, would be devoted to the study of the theory, and three other days to the practical application of the science. Dr. Woolley went on to say that that principle would be preserved in the new school at Kensington, but with this important difference, that the time devoted to the practical study of shipbuilding at the dockyards would be six months in the year, and that for the remaining six months scientific instruction would be given at the school in London. He certainly did not think that arrangement at all advantageous, and he feared that the students would, in the six months during which they were practically working in the shipyards, forget a great deal of what they had previously learnt from lectures in the school. In like manner, he felt that students could not properly follow up a practical study of shipbuilding if they were taken away from it every six months. As the scheme, drawn up by a Committee of the Institute of Naval Architects, was presented to the Admiralty by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich, he should like to be informed who the gentlemen forming that Committee were, because a great deal must depend on the degree of authority which would attach to their names. He certainly considered it most extraordinary that Dr. Woolley, an Inspector of Schools, should be selected to draw up a scheme for a School of Naval Architecture. His inquiries had convinced him of the truth of what he had stated on a former occasion, that almost everything that was required could at present be taught in the dockyards, where there was an efficient educational staff, who were able to give lectures on almost every subject included in the programme, and who, in case of necessity, might be supplemented at a very slight additional expense. At Portsmouth there was a naval college and a laboratory equal, if not superior, to any out of the metropolis. There was a similar establishment at Devonport. There was also the School of Naval Engineers. Surely much better instruction could be afforded at these establishments than at Kensington, where the pupils had no means of working out the lessons which they received during the time they were obliged to attend the lectures. The original School of Naval Architecture at Portsmouth had been conducted most successfully, and to that institution the country was indebted for some of the most able men connected with the Admiralty. The second school, established in 1845, and which was in existence for some four or five years, had been equally successful. There was an admirable building which had cost £35,000, which was comparatively lying idle; and yet the House was to be called upon to expend a large sum at Kensington on a building unfitted for the purpose to which it was to be devoted. The whole of the salaries would amount to £7,000 a year, and he should like to know whether they would be paid during the whole or only during the half-year. There were to be, he understood, only eight shipwrights and eight engineer students, with probably half-a-dozen private pupils; and he submitted that there was no justification for the establishment of such a large and costly new staff for twenty-two students, more especially as they had a sufficient staff already in the dockyards. The whole expenses of the former School of Naval Architecture did not exceed £2,000 a year, and it was given up because there were not enough openings for the pupils who were educated there. At South Kensington there was no educational staff suited to give lectures, as the noble Lord had led them to believe. He was not aware of any branch of instruction which could not be given at Portsmouth, with perhaps a little additional assistance, as well as, if not better than, at South Kensington. He hoped the noble and gallant Lord would tell them whether the scheme had undergone examination at the Treasury as well as at the Admiralty. The school ought to be established where there could be daily instruction in all the different practical operations of shipbuilding. It was very important that students should have the opportunity of watching the construction of a vessel, not for detached periods, but continuously from beginning to end. That could not be done under the system now proposed. He maintained that, whether or not South Kensington would, as was alleged, inspire students with "a sense of the beautiful," it would not give adequate facilities for the inspection of machinery such as would be afforded at a dockyard. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the New School of Naval Architecture ought to be established in immediate connection with one of the chief Naval Arsenals, where the students may have, together with scientific lectures of a high order, the benefit of regular, progressive, and continuous instruction in every branch of practical shipbuilding, as well as constant opportunities of inspecting and studying steam and other machinery, the varied armaments, and numerous operations carried out in the docking, fitting out, and working of every species of vessel embraced by the Royal Navy; and further, that the South Kensington Establishments and Museums are altogether wanting in the educational staff and means of practical application indispensable for such School," — (Mr. Augustus Smith.)

—instead thereof.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman as to the great importance to our naval interests, that there should be established a good scientific school for the education of naval architects. The hon. Gentleman seemed to doubt whether the Government had acted wisely in deciding that the proposed school should be established in the metropolis instead of at one of our naval arsenals. Now he (Sir John Pakington) found himself in rather a peculiar position in having to speak for the Admiralty from that side of the House; he was bound to say that he did not share the doubt of the hon. Member on that point. In justice to himself and others he was also bound to say, that in the course of his speech the hon. Gentleman had fallen into several misapprehensions with respect to the part which he had taken in framing and promoting the scheme. Neither in that House nor elsewhere had he ever taken credit to himself for the establishment of the school. He did not presume to be competent to express a satisfactory opinion upon the various scientific questions involved, and if he had taken a rather active part in the transactions connected with the establishment of the school, he had done so solely in his capacity of president of the Institute of Naval Architects. What really led to the establishment of the school was a most able paper drawn up by Mr. Scott Russell, and read by him to the annual meeting of the Institute of Naval Architects as far back as March, 1863. The shipbuilders present on that occasion were much struck by the statements which the paper contained; but their attention was particularly attracted by the allegation of Mr. Russell, that he and other eminent builders had been obliged to send their sons to France in order to be properly instructed in Naval Architecture, as there was no institution in England where they could be trained. In consequence of that remarkable statement the Council of the Institute took the whole subject into their consideration, and the result of their deliberations was that they requested him, as their president, to enter into communication with the Admiralty, expressing their belief, in which he shared, that the best plan for the interests of the country would be to establish a new School of Naval Architecture on such a footing that it might be beneficial both to the Royal Navy and to the mercantile marine. Acting on the request of the Council, he had several interviews with the Duke of Somerset, and with the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, and he would not be doing justice to them if he did not acknowledge the frank and cordial manner in which they entered into the scheme, and evinced their readiness to meet the views of the merchant service as represented by the Institute of Naval Architects. The hon. Member had cited the authority of Sir William Snow Harris, in favour of the establishment of the school, not in the metropolis, but in one of our great arsenals. He had a great respect for Sir William Snow Harris, but he could not concur in his view. It might be all very well, if a School of Naval Architecture solely for the benefit of the Royal Navy were in question, to establish it, as before, at one of the arsenals; but the proposed school was to serve the interests of the mercantile marine as well as those of the Royal Navy, and for such an institution one of the arsenals would not be a convenient site. The hon. Member called for the revival of the old school at Portsmouth. He admitted that the late Sir James Graham never made a greater mistake than when he abolished instead of altering and improving the Portsmouth school; but the great objection to that institution was that, though capable of being made an efficient aid to the Royal Navy, it was not fitted from its site to confer the smallest benefit on the mercantile marine, as there was no means of giving any other instruction than what the dockyards afforded. The hon. Member wished to know who drew up the scheme for the proposed school. In reply he had to state that the whole subject was first of all considered by the Council of the Institute of Naval Architects; that the Council then appointed a Committee to go into the details, and that, as the hon. Gentleman would see by glancing at the names, the scheme was framed by the most eminent men in the shipbuilding profession. He would not say there was not an eminent man connected with the mercantile marine who did not approve the whole plan, but he had not heard of any gentleman of eminence as a shipbuilder who had expressed any dissent from the arrangement which had been made, and he submitted that when the Admiralty authorities and the great body of the merchant service were found concurring in a scheme, the fair inference was that no great objection could be taken to it. For his own part, he believed that, whether as regarded the interests of the Royal Navy or those of the mercantile marine, the best arrangement had been adopted, and that the Government had come to a wise decision in resolving to establish the school in the metropolis, which was the most convenient of access from all parts of the country, and where there were greater facilities for scientific instruction than could be found in any other part of the country.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he had only a very few words to add to the remarks of the right hon. Baronet. In the opinion of Dr. Woolley, whose valuable services were about to be transferred to the Admiralty from the Department of Science and Art, there existed at none of the naval ports either instructors or any of the appliances necessary for a good School of Naval Architecture. He supposed the hon. Gentleman would not demur to the opinion of so eminent an authority as Dr. Woolley. The hon. Gentleman thought it was desirable to combine the theoretical with the practical instruction. On that point Dr. Woolley said that at South Kensington the services of the most eminent lecturers in the subsidiary sciences of chemistry, metallurgy, physics, and practical mechanics were already secured, while competent instructors in the sciences more immediately professional were more readily obtainable there than elsewhere. He also said that the principle of devoting one-half of the time of the pupils to instruction in the theory, and the other half to instruction in the practice of their profession, would be kept intact in the new school. Mr. Scott Russell, whose valuable suggestion had been referred to by the right hon. Baronet opposite, after adverting to the immense advantages which the French possessed in their Naval School at Paris, which was a long way from any dockyard, and to which English shipbuilders sent their sons, said they should ask the Government to allow the young men to come to London without forfeiting their dockyard pay in order to attend the college; and that in the dockyards there was now a preliminary training given for the higher instruction which should be obtained at the institution in London.

The hon. Member said that a correct account of the cost of the school had not been given to the House; but in a paper which had been laid on the table at the hon. Gentleman's desire, there was a detailed estimate of the whole cost of the college, and also of the allowance to the young men, which estimate was a correct one as far as their knowledge went. Many persons supposed that the school would become self-supporting. All the scientific men, with the exception of Sir William Snow Harris (for whom he had the highest respect, but who was not an authority on that matter), and all the ship-builders, whether connected with the Admiralty or with private yards, with whom he had been in communication, were extremely satisfied with the proposed school, and entertained the greatest hopes of its success. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Member would not persist in opposing the school. They had taken the lecture rooms at Kensington on economical grounds. Those rooms might be capable of improvement, but they were already used for the Department of Science and Art, and there was no doubt that they were adapted for the purpose in view.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH: Will the professors be migratory as well as the students?

TRADE OF COVENTRY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. TREHERNE said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the injury which the staple trades of Coventry have suffered, and are still suffering, from the operation of the Commercial Treaty with France, and to ask the Government, Whether they will use their influence with the French Government to obtain the same free admission into France of English Ribbands and Watches as is accorded by that Treaty, on the principle of Free Trade, to French manufactures of a similar description in England? His constituents were still suffering so much from the consequences of the French Treaty that, although labouring under infirm health, he felt it to be his duty no longer to delay bringing their case under the notice of the House. They had heard a great deal about free trade, and it was on that principle that he requested the favourable consideration of the Government. The value of an abstract principle depended entirely on the manner of its application. Free trade implied an intercourse carried on without hindrance or obstruction on either side; but in the treaty to which he referred, protective duties were retained for the benefit of one country and wholly abolished in the case of the other. That was the bargain which our Plenipotentiary had made for the disadvantage of the silk trade and certain other branches of our industry — a bargain contrary to the principles which Mr. Cobden himself had approved in the month of June 1859, when he endorsed the principles of the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, and which every fair-dealing man would also approve. About the year 1860 the city of Coventry began to experience such severe distress as, he believed, had not been exceeded in Lancashire or any other part of the country. He would not seek to harrow up the feelings of the House by a narrative of persons dying from want, nor would he dwell on the fact that weavers, who had been brought up rather better than the common labourer, had been obliged to accept sixpence a day for grubbing up commons, and working with the spade and shovel, to gain a miserable subsistence. What he wished to urge upon the Government was, that they ought to do something for his constituents, and endeavour to put an end to a state of things under which Coventry ribbands could not be sent into France without paying a duty of 7½ per cent, whereas the French were permitted to send their ribbands into England without paying one farthing of customs duty. The old saying, "Fair play is a jewel," was one by which Englishmen liked to be guided in their conduct. His constituents sought to bring their case under the consideration of Parliament, not pressing it unduly, not framing any condemnatory Resolution, but simply bringing the facts to the knowledge of the House, and asking whether they were such as to meet with the approval of the Legislature. And it was the duty of those who passed that treaty, and who urged the Emperor of the French to make the arrangements which had led to the hardships complained of, to see whether by further negotiation they could not obtain some welcome concessions. The city of Coventry, whose connection with the riband trade dated from the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, had for many years been a flourishing city. In 1801 the population was 16,049, in 1861 it contained no less than 41,647 inhabitants. Up to that time the weavers always had plenty to eat, and economized their funds for the purchase of looms, at which the father of a family worked, surrounded and assisted by his children, whom he was thus enabled to bring up decently and to educate well. These looms cost as much as £50 to £80 each to buy; but when pressure came upon them in consequence of the treaty, and the choice lay between starvation and selling their looms, they were obliged to part with these for £5 each. Although the town contained the very large proportion of 5,000 electors, as a class they were so high-spirited that until the last election, when distress was general, any one known to accept parish relief was sure to be taunted with it upon the hustings. Many years ago, when first he canvassed the electors, he had seen men eating potatoes and salt rather than apply for parochial aid. Now, on the contrary, men with their utmost exertions could not earn enough to support life. The ill effects entailed upon Coventry were by some attributed to a change of fashion, leading to consequent change in dress. But the consumption of riband, far from diminishing, had increased of late years, having become a prominent feature in the trimming of bonnets and dresses. The Coventry weavers were confident that they could still beat the foreign manufacturers if they only competed on equal terms; but from undue competition great numbers had been obliged to leave their native place for the colonies, and though the population had thus diminished, the inmates of the workhouse had increased from 169 in the week ending April 23, 1859, to 231 in the corresponding week of 1864, being at the rate of 40 per cent additional. Before 1860 there were seventy or eighty master riband weavers in Coventry; now there were not half that number, and from the want of private looms additional numbers of hands were driven to the factory, where nothing like remunerative employment could be afforded. Out of about 9,000 houses, 1,500 were without occupants, and yet some people with more money than wisdom were building twenty-five new houses; in fact, the place wore a deserted appearance. It was said that Coventry had been greatly affected by the American war; but it was curious to note that in the watch trade, which that conflict must have affected, there had been a revival; while in the riband trade, upon which the war had no perceptible effect, there had been a marked falling off. At present a weaver, taking advantage of all the opportunities that were open to him, could not earn half as much in Coventry as a bricklayer's labourer. Even if peace were restored in America the watch trade would not be expected to be much improved, as an ad valorem import duty of 60 per cent was levied on English watches. The French import duty on English watches was $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Coventry was interested in ribands, but was not so much concerned in broad silks as Macclesfield, Manchester, and other places. The imports of broad silks in 1858 were 309,926lb.; in 1863, 1,504,848lb., being an increase of 500 per cent. The imports of foreign watches were, in 1858, 99,335; in 1863, 160,648. The imports of ribands in 1857 were 375,890lb.; in 1863, 849,835lb., being an increase of more than 100 per cent. On the other hand, the exports had fallen off. The exports of English ribands in 1859, the year before the treaty, were 25,580lb.; in 1863 they had dwindled to 13,709lb. He thanked the House for the attention it had given to the case of his constituents, and he trusted that the Government would, both on grounds of humanity and justice, take their claims into favourable consideration.

Mr. Treherne

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, he was unfortunately able to bear testimony to the severe distress which had existed, and still existed, in Coventry. He was unable to take quite the same view with his hon. Colleague as to the causes of that distress; but he was perfectly satisfied that the French Treaty, coming into operation at the particular moment it did, had greatly contributed to that unfortunate result. Indeed, it had had a most injurious influence, not only upon the trade of Coventry, but upon the silk trade of the country generally. He was told that at the present time at Macclesfield there were 2,000 houses unoccupied. No doubt there had been various times when the silk manufacturers of Spitalfields, Coventry, and Macclesfield had been in great distress; but the French Treaty coming into operation at the very moment when the riband trade was already in a state of great depression had greatly aggravated that distress. He argued at the time, that if the duties on the importation of riband had been gradually lowered instead of being taken off at once, the whole tax of 15 per cent, the abolition would not have pressed so severely on the riband manufacturers. His hon. Colleague had expressed an opinion that English ribands should be admitted into France upon the same terms as French ribands were admitted into this country, and he (Sir Joseph Paxton) thought that if proper representations were made to the Government of the Emperor of the French, that might be done. The manufacturers of Coventry could not compete with the French in the production of the finer kinds of ribands, but they made an inferior kind of riband cheaper than it could be made in France; and they believed that they could carry on a considerable trade in this article if it were admitted into France on equal terms. With regard to the present distress in Coventry, he was bound to bear his testimony to the marvellous patience and forbearance with which the weavers had borne their sufferings. The whole inhabitants seemed to be actuated by a pride and determination to abstain, even under circumstances of the deepest privation, from seeking relief from the parish; and there was no place in England of equal population where the poor rates had been on an average so low as in Coventry. The freemen would rather starve than accept relief from the parish; and they were no doubt to some extent influenced in that resolve by their extreme reluctance to forfeit their right to vote. He should be glad if the request of his hon. Colleague could be complied with. One of the French Chambers of Commerce most interested in the question had declared that they had no wish to maintain the protection; and it seemed a strange omission in the treaty that the French duty should have been maintained when so great a reduction was made in the duty levied upon French ribands in this country. He felt sure that if vigorous representations were made to the French Government they would consent to forego the duty now placed upon this article imported from this country.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said, it was quite true that it had been repeatedly urged upon the Government that they should exert their influence with the Government of France to procure a better market on the Continent for the cheap ribands manufactured at Coventry. His hon. Friend, however, had made a remark in which there was much force—namely, that the Coventry manufacturers, in their turn, must submit to the application of the principles of free trade; and seeing that the manufacturers of nearly all other articles had been required by the Legislature to submit to free competition, it was clear that the same principles would ultimately have to be applied to the silk and riband manufacturers of Coventry. The Coventry manufacturers were about the last to whom the principles of free trade had been applied. It was put off in their case for a long period; but no doubt, whether there had been a French treaty or not, it would have ultimately been the policy of Parliament to apply to the silk manufacturers the principles which had been applied to the other manufacturers of the country. The hon. Gentleman who had brought forward the Motion put in a word for the paper manufacturers, and said that riband manufacturers and the paper manufacturers had been unfairly treated. But the hon. Gentleman had forgotten that his own constituents were much interested in free trade in paper, because they said it was so extensively used in packing their manufactures that its price ought not to be enhanced by a protective duty.

Mr. TREHERNE said, the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood him. He had alluded to an agitation which he had heard was going to be got up in the spirit of free trade.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON: All he could say was that it was an advantage to the riband makers of Coventry to have free trade in paper. He deplored the distress which prevailed in Coventry, and if any representation which could be made would have a tendency to mitigate that distress, such representation should have his support. But although there was a duty upon ribands imported into France, that duty was not very low. The French Government had adopted the policy of entire freedom of trade in the import of goods into France; but while they retained a duty on manufactured goods imported into France, it could not be said that the duty was very large. For instance, on velvet ribands it was 5 per cent, ad valorem; on other descriptions 8 per cent, ad valorem; and on mixed kinds 10 per cent, ad valorem. These duties did probably stand in the way of the trade of the cheap ribands manufactured at Coventry being carried on in France; but he was glad to find that there was a tendency to increase the export of British silk ribands. Take, for instance, the returns for the first five months of 1864, as compared with some months of 1863. In 1863, during the first five months of the year, the value of goods exported was £24,000, while in the same months of 1864 the amount had risen to £50,000, or more than double. He did not say this increase would go on throughout the entire year, yet the return at present bore a very favourable aspect. He believed that there were symptoms of a revival of trade in Coventry. With regard to the imports into England, although he admitted there was an increase, yet one fact must be taken into consideration. He was informed that the weight given of ribands imported included the packing paper, and therefore the whole quantity of ribands was not so large as appeared on the return. And then the sale of ribands was affected by the fashions: it must be remembered that ribands were not now so extensively worn as formerly; and he was informed there had been considerable distress in the trade in France. The hon. Gentleman said he did not think the American war had any effect upon the riband trade. He very much doubted whether that statement was correct. He should rather say that the American war had had a considerable effect upon the demand for silk goods in France, and consequently the English market being open would be flooded by French goods and prices unduly depressed. There had been many causes which had been operating together to produce the present depressed state of the riband manufacture, and it was not fair to say that the only cause of the alleged distress was the operation of the French Treaty. He felt that this was one of those cases in which the House could really do little. He entirely sympathized with the hon. Gentleman and his Colleague, but he was afraid it was beyond the power of legislation to meet that distress in the way that, perhaps, some hon. Members thought it might be met. The policy of the country would not admit of that course of proceeding. Any representations that could be made at a fitting opportunity, he, for one, would be most happy to back. Speaking for the Government at large, he would say that they would only be too glad to see the same freedom in the importation of British manufactures into France and other countries that we permitted those countries to enjoy in England.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was not about to enter into the history of the protracted distress which had existed, and was still felt, in Coventry and a large district of Warwickshire. It was impossible to dispute the facts, because, as his hon. Friend had said, 4,000 people had left Coventry. He had had some experience, having acted upon the relief committee for three successive years. A computation had been made, that from eleven to twelve thousand people had left Coventry and that district. He was happy to say that neither the people of the city of Coventry, nor the upper classes of North Warwickshire, had sat down idle under the distress. They had made every exertion. They had promoted other manufactures. The very clothes he (Mr. Newdegate) wore had been made by riband weavers, who had turned their hands to cloth manufacture and to other sources of obtaining a livelihood. But, notwithstanding all these exertions, the depression had been very severe, and he was sorry to say the trade was sinking. He did not wish to go back to all the circumstances that occurred in 1860; but he remembered urging the hon. Member for Coventry opposite (Sir Joseph Paxton) to do all he could to delay the change. He was sorry to say that in 1860 the hon. Member did not agree with him; but he was willing to bear testimony to his exertions to obtain such a change in the stipulations of the Treaty as should place the riband trade of England exactly on a par with the trade in France. He voted with the hon. Gentleman when he asked that the change should be simultaneous, and that the same terms should be adopted by either country; but they met with no success. This matter had not rested with the House of Commons. He was sorry to say that the House had been precluded by the fact that the Treaty had been negotiated, as they were then precluded; and they could not do more than express a hope that her Majesty's Government would approach the Government of France, and represent that as France had gained great advantages from the Treaty, they would use the discretion which they possessed in order to place the export of English silk goods, particularly ribands, upon the same terms as the imports from France were received in this country. That was the request they made, and he was afraid, from the tone of the Government, that there was little prospect of its acceptance. When his constituents were now told that years ago they should have foreseen the change which has befallen them, and the distress which they had suffered in consequence of that change, he would ask, whether any class of manufacturers was justified in trusting to the faith of the Legislature? The faith of the Legislature had been as much pledged to the continuance of the protection of the silk manufacture as they were now told it is pledged to the abolition of every import duty which could afford protection to any branch of native industry. If it were not for the French Treaty it was his firm conviction that there would have been a modification in that rigid rule. He admitted that if it were possible to abolish import duties throughout the whole world that would constitute free trade; but that supposition rested upon a fallacy. It rested upon the belief that all the world would be governed by one system, or that there would spring up some gigantic power which should govern all the world. When they looked at the import duties levied by the United States, and when they looked at the stipulations of that very Treaty—under which import duties of 7 per cent at present, with power to raise them to 30 per cent for a time, and then to fix them at 15 per cent—he could not believe that we had yet reached that period when the nations of the world would consent to be governed by one absolute system of free imports; he was afraid it was chimerical to look forward to that period. In the United States import duties were the main source of the Federal revenue, for by the constitution they could not impose export duties; and the levying of direct taxes upon real property within the states was the privilege of the states themselves, from which the Federal Government was debarred except in cases of war and great emergency. Therefore he thought it was idle to look forward to a period when the system of free imports would universally prevail. Believing that, he had only to hope that the Government would take into consideration the long period of patient suffering which his constituents had undergone. He spoke it to his honour that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his private capacity had extended to them his aid, and they were grateful to their fellow-countrymen for the sum of £50,000, which had preserved thousands from absolute destitution. The depression had not ceased, although it was abated. The people were willing to turn to other trades; but the period of transition was one of great suffering, for it was impossible to divert a population who had been brought up to an occupation requiring skill in one generation from the prosecution of that trade. He thought it most unreasonable that the House should declare that we should have no silk or riband trade in this country. It had been a profitable business, under which had grown up an intelligent, thrifty, and worthy population, who shrunk from parochial relief. Could it be sound policy to crush such a population? He thought not. He hoped that the Government would accept as a fact, proved by four years' experience, that there was great depression, and that they would ask the French Government to reciprocate more closely the extreme liberality which induced us to abandon the whole duty upon the importation of silk goods and ribands.

INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. HUBBARD said, that he was desirous of putting a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with the view of clearing the honour and character of a public servant. On a former occasion he had referred to a document emanating from the Inland Revenue Department as a proof of the demoralizing effect produced by the operation of the Income Tax. That document, dated the 1st of March, 1849, directed the collectors who received the drainage rent charges in Scotland not to suggest to the payers that they were entitled to allowances for Income Tax, but to make the allowances only in case they should be asked for. He had characterized the document as discreditable, and he understood that Mr. Fletcher, at the head of the Inland Revenue Office in Edinburgh, feared that he might be supposed to be involved in the censure then expressed. He, therefore, wished to state that he had been informed that Mr. Fletcher, so far from being implicated in drawing up that document, had taken the earliest opportunity of remonstrating against its tenour, and had suggested that the instructions should be reconsidered. He believed that they were reconsidered and withdrawn, and he, consequently, thought it right to state what had come to his knowledge with respect to Mr. Fletcher; but he regretted that in a matter of this kind, when character was at stake, there should not be the possibility of acquitting every one of the public officers concerned with the document, and he would be glad to see all of them eagerly rush, one after the other, to disclaim any responsibility with regard to the document in question. He was unwilling to fasten on any one the responsibility of a paper so discreditable. Holding very high the character of the public servants, he would be the last to cast any imputation on them. He believed that the country was singularly happy in having public servants distinguished for their high character and integrity, and, therefore, the blame was to be thrown, not on any one of the public servants, but upon the miserable law which the officers of the Inland Revenue Board were the unhappy instruments to carry into execution. In order that Mr. Fletcher's character might be entirely cleared, he would now beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it be true that Mr. Angus Fletcher, the head of the Inland Revenue Department in Edinburgh, is in no way responsible for originating the Circular to Collectors of Drainage Rent Charges, dated the 1st of March, 1849; that, on the contrary, Mr. Fletcher remonstrated against the tenour of the Circular, and obtained authority for the Collectors to allow the Income Tax legally due to the parties paying the Drainage Annuities, whether they claimed it or not; and if he will lay upon the table of the House the instructions of the Board of Inland Revenue for the issue of the Circular, Mr. Fletcher's Remonstrance, and the Reply of the Board?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER had great pleasure in answering the Question, as far as regarded the character of Mr. Fletcher; but he confessed he was sorry that his hon. Friend had thought it necessary to give utterance to the highly fanciful doctrine that the vice of the document he had referred to had actually affected the moral tone of the officers of the Inland Revenue Board. When he first heard that doctrine he thought it might have been broached in the heat of debate, and he regretted to find that it was the hon. Member's permanent and serious conviction. The fact was, that the Board of Inland Revenue made a mistake, to the effect of requiring that the burden of applying for the deductions should be thrown on the parties, instead of the deductions being allowed at once without application; but to imply that that proceeding had a connection with any moral deterioration was a wholly unnecessary and gratuitous assumption. It was simply an error, and nothing but an error; and it was in the nature of Revenue Boards, as it was in the nature of all persons engaged incessantly in business, occasionally to make errors. His hon. Friend could not have been so fortunate as never to have made a mistake.

Mr. Hubbard

For his own part, he committed many mistakes himself, and found that others did the same. It did not, therefore, produce such marvellous astonishment in his mind when he learnt, that those performing such difficult duties as the Board of Inland Revenue once perhaps, in a thousand years, fell into an error. There was no necessity for making such a charge as the hon. Gentleman had done. A circular was issued to the effect that deductions would be allowed only to those persons who made application. Mr. Fletcher, so far from being responsible for it, no sooner learnt what had been done, than he wrote to the Board of Inland Revenue pointing out the error, and the Board immediately corrected it. That was the whole affair, and he could not help thinking his hon. Friend's charges were out of place. His hon. Friend had acquitted Mr. Fletcher; and he might have extended the acquittal to all parties concerned. As to the papers, he would have no objection to produce them if his hon. Friend moved for them; but he trusted that, after that explanation, he would not deem it necessary to do so.

Mr. HUBBARD said, he wished it to be understood that he made no attack on the officials. It was the system which they had to administer that was to blame.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(1.) £525,404, to complete the sum for Public Education, Great Britain.

Mr. H. A. BRUCE, in rising to move the Vote for the furtherance of Public Education, said, that the exceptional circumstances under which the Vote had been administered last year—two different systems, the Code of 1860 and the Revised Code having both been in operation—rendered it impossible to form a perfectly accurate estimate as to the expenditure for the coming year. The estimate, however, was fixed at £705,404. His right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) who moved the estimate of last year, was under circumstances of similar difficulty to those in which he was now placed, and calculated the amount required at £804,002. In this estimate he had taken an ample margin, for the expenditure of last year was £721,391 against £774,743 in 1862, and there was, therefore, a diminution of £53,351. The reduction in the expenditure arose chiefly on two items—building grants, £24,831, and annual grants for the maintenance of schools, £37,143. Against those reductions, however, had to be placed increased payments of £9,516 for normal schools, which occurred mainly in Scotland, where far more persons were educated as teachers than were required for the purpose, and of £2,160 for the cost of inspection and administration. The cause which interfered with the accuracy of the estimate was, first of all, the fact that the Revised Code did not come into such general operation as was expected, 457,000 children being the number estimated as likely to be in average attendance and entitled to payment, while the actual attendance was only 180,005. Another reason was that all new schools which received grants during the past year were examined for the first time, and the scholars in these schools being necessarily less advanced than those under inspection the amount of grant paid in these cases was not so high. The result was that the payment per head, instead of being, as his right hon. Friend anticipated, 10s., was only 8s. 1d. There seemed to be good reason to believe that the payment would be greater in the coming year, and they had therefore, taken it at 9s. 3d. The number of children present at inspection in 1863 was 1,092,741, as against 1,057,426 in 1862, the increase being 35,315. During the year the building grants to elementary schools paid out of the Vote amounted to £36,681; but besides that there was contributed for building purposes by voluntary contributions £128,129; so that, altogether, £164,811 was expended on that account; 125 new schools were built, 50 schools were enlarged, and 82 teachers' residences were erected. The number of scholars for whom additional accommodation was provided was 27,098; thus bringing the total accommodation up to 1,512,000 children, which probably corresponded pretty closely with the number on the books. The number of schools visited by the Inspectors was 7,739, or taking departments of schools—dividing them into boys, girls, and infants—11,230. These schools were taught by 10,136 certificated teachers, and 14,180 pupil-teachers, making a total of 24,316. The Inspectors also visited 40 training colleges, in which were 3,109 students, 179 schools for pauper children, with 12,454 scholars, which had been transferred to the Poor Law Board, and 26 industrial schools, with 2,159 children now transferred to the Home Department. These were the figures relative to the transactions of the past year. But it might interest the Committee to know the statistics with regard to two other years—1854, of which they had accurate Returns, and 1861, when the Vote was at the highest. The number of inspected schools was 3,825 in 1854, 7,705 in 1861, and 7,739 in 1863. The accommodation in the schools was in 1854 for 558,000 scholars, in 1861 for 1,396,000, in 1863 for 1,512,000. The number of scholars actually under inspection was 473,000 in 1854, 1,028,000 in 1861, and 1,092,000 in 1863. The cost in 1854 was £326,000; in 1861, £813,000; and in 1863, £721,000. It would be observed that of late years the ratio of increase was not so great as in the earlier years during which the Education Grant was made. No doubt, one reason why a lull had taken place was due to the system on which the Vote rested—namely, that voluntary efforts were required to precede State grants, and certain securities were taken for the efficiency of the schools. Another reason was that in the first instance schools were established in the great centres of population, where they were most needed, and where the means existed in the greatest abundance for founding them. There were in England 14,877 parishes. More than half of the population of England and Wales—that was 10,000,000—were contained in 618 of these parishes. All but 53, or 8 per cent of the 618, were provided with schools more or less abundantly—all with one, and some with more. These 618 parishes had each 5,000 or upwards of population. There were, however, 8,761 parishes, having each a less population than 500; and only 765 of these, or 8·8 per cent, had schools receiving aid from the State. Of these 8,761 parishes, 4,149 had a population of less than 200. Consequently, it was in these cases almost impossible to provide schools according to the requirements of the Privy Council, unless means were taken to unite some of the parishes. The difficulty of doing so had been insisted on by the Royal Commission, and, although various attempts had been made, they had proved unsuccessful. It seemed extremely difficult to devise any plan, under the existing system, by which aid could be extended to small parishes. Another reason why educational progress had been less rapid of late years than formerly, arose from the religious circumstances of the country. One of the Articles of the Revised Code was, that the religious denomination of a school should be suitable for the families relied upon for supplying the scholars. Now, in most of the smaller parishes the clergyman was the person who took the most active part in the promotion of education, and he was generally supported by the landed proprietors. After connecting himself with the National Society, which represented the Church, he usually applied for aid to the Committee of Privy Council. But the difficulty which arose was this—that there were few small parishes in which there were not some Dissenters, for whose children a school under the regulations of the National Society was not suited. In the larger parishes where there was room for more than one school, schools might be founded upon the Church principles, and placed in connection with the National Society without doing injustice to the Dissenting population; and in those parishes where no Dissenters existed the difficulty would not arise at all; but wherever a certain proportion of the inhabitants—say, for example, one-fourth—were Dissenters, the question presented itself whether a school in connection with the National Society could, under the Revised Code, be properly assisted. The practice of the Education Committee in such cases was not what it had been asserted to be—to insist upon the insertion of conscience clauses which should protect the religious opinions of Dissenting children. In such cases they simply refused to make a grant; and when asked their reasons they stated that they were founded upon the obvious injustice of giving public aid to a school where the children of Dissenting parents were compelled, under pain of exclusion, to learn the Church catechism and to attend the Church. Wherever the promoters or managers of a school consented to give security for the protection of Dissenting children a grant was made; wherever that security was not given a grant was refused. It had been represented that this was an interference with religious teaching on the part of the Committee. No charge could be more unjust. All the Committee asked was, that a Dissenting parent should have the right of withdrawing his child, if he so pleased, from the religious teaching of a school in connection with the National Society; and the Royal Commissioners had pointed out the manifest injustice of compelling Dissenting children to attend the Church and learn the catechism. The French law, introduced into a Roman Catholic country by a Protestant Minister, was wise and liberal. It provided that the wishes of fathers of families should always be consulted and followed in that which related to the participation of their children in religious instruction. Surely in an eminently Protestant country it would be admitted that every man should be the director, not only of his own conscience, but of that of his children. Those who objected to the practice of the Privy Council said that no hardship really arose, because such was the liberality of feeling on the part of the clergy that rarely, if ever, did any clergyman or manager of a school insist upon the children of Dissenting parents learning the catechism or attending the Church. He admitted the zeal of the clergy in the cause of education, and the great liberality with which they had generally acted, even when in connection with the National Society, and seemingly under an obligation to insist upon attendance at church. Cases of violation of liberty of conscience were not frequent, but some had occurred, and within the last week he had heard of one where children of Dissenters were taken from school because the clergyman, acting under a conscientious sense of duty, insisted on their going to church. That intolerant feeling was not general; but religious sentiment on such points changed from time to time, and although at present the prevailing feeling among clergymen might be liberal, yet ten, twenty, or thirty years might produce a great alteration in their convictions and policy. It was, therefore, the duty of the Council, in every parish where only one school could be established, to see that perfect security was taken against the violation of the religious feelings of a Dissenting minority. In memorials and periodical publications, the course pursued by the Council had been untruly stigmatized as unjust and impolitic. Unjust he was sure it was not, while the impolicy rested with those who were guilty of intolerance. The past year was the first in which the examinations under the Revised Code had been brought into large operation. No fewer than 1,828 schools, at which the average attendance was 280,474, were examined. Out of these 280,474 children, 180,005, or about 64 per cent, were presented for examination; and it would be recollected that the children qualified for examination must have attended 200 times. There were examined under the first standard 70,407; under the second, 45,180; under the third, 35,991; under the fourth, 22,137; under the fifth, 4,671; under the sixth, 1,619. The total number of failures, excluding distinction of standards, was in day schools 17 per cent. There were failures in reading to the extent of 13 per cent; in writing, to the extent of 15 per cent; and in arithmetic, to the extent of 23 per cent. The number of children under six years of age to whom grants were made without examination was 43,798, or about 15 per cent of the average number attending the same schools. The examinations were conducted in accordance with the supplementary rules issued as an authoritative answer to a vast number of questions addressed to the Council, both by managers and by the Inspectors themselves. Those rules were in strict conformity with the spirit of the Revised Code, and they were necessary in order to prevent confusion. The Royal Commission of 1861 reported that the children remained at school under more favourable circumstances till they were about twelve years of age, and under less favourable circumstances till they were ten years old; and the highest standard under the Revised Code did not go beyond what, in the opinion of the Commissioners, a child of ten years and upwards ought to be able to do on leaving school. The sixth or highest standard for the most advanced class, required that the scholars should be able to read a short paragraph in a newspaper, to write to dictation, and work a sum in bills of parcels; and if the children arrived at that point which, in the opinion of the Commissioners they were capable of reaching under a good system of examination, the number who presented themselves would not have been 1,589, or only about $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the whole, but 70,000. The opinion of the Commissioners was supported by several of the Inspectors, and by one of those gentlemen whose opinions were much quoted in that House during the discussion of the Revised Code—he meant Mr. Fraser. Mr. Fraser's view of what a child of ten years old might fairly be called upon to do, and what it ought to be able to do, if the education he received was to be of permanent profit to him, was expressed in these terms—

"I venture to maintain that it is quite possible to teach a child soundly and thoroughly, in a way that he shall not forget it, all that is necessary for him to possess in the shape of intellectual attainment by the time he is ten years old. If he has been properly looked after in the lower classes he shall be able to spell correctly the words that he will ordinarily have to use; he shall read a common narrative—the paragraph in the newspaper he cares to read—with sufficient ease to be a pleasure to himself and to convey information to listeners; if gone to live a distance from home, he shall write his mother a letter that shall be both legible and intelligible; he knows enough of ciphering to make out or test the correctness of a common shop bill; if he hears talk of foreign countries he has some notion as to the part of the habitable globe in which they lie; and underlying all, and not without its influence, I trust, upon his life and conversation, he has acquaintance enough with the Holy Scriptures to follow the allusions and arguments of a plain Saxon sermon, and a sufficient recollection of the truths taught him in his catechism to know what are the duties required of him towards his Maker and his fellow man."

That that standard was not reached under the present system was obvious, from the figures which he had adduced; and he knew not what stronger argument could be presented for the introduction of the Revised Code and a system of individual examination, than the fact that out of 70,000 children over ten years of age less than 1,600 of them on leaving school were able to pass the standard which, in the opinion of the Royal Commissioners, all such children ought to have reached. The question had been raised whether these supplementary rules under which the examination was conducted ought or ought not to be laid on the table. It was provided by the Revised Code that any new rule involving a material alteration of or departure from the Code should be laid on the table; and it was for the Department in the exercise of good faith and good sense to determine whether a rule was such a material alteration as that it should be submitted to the immediate consideration of the House. Sooner or later it was laid on the table, for the supplementary rules found their way into the annual Reports, and were submitted to the criticism of the House and the country. But he maintained that in that case there was no material departure from either the language or the spirit of the Code; that these rules were merely declaratory, that they were laid down for the public convenience, and that without them or some similar rules the system of examination that would have been enforced, had the narrowest interpretation been put upon the Revised Code, would have been a mere mockery. The examination had been determined, not by the choice of the Inspectors, but by the mere fact that the inspection fell due at a later time of the year; and, therefore, they might accept the results as a fair specimen of the state of education throughout the country. The Privy Council had not overlooked one danger which might arise from a too strict adherence to the letter of the Revised Code, and they had given instructions to their Inspectors not simply to examine into proficiency in reading, writing, and arithmetic, but to pay the greatest attention to the other requirements of a good school. That, he believed, was a regulation which would not be found fault with from any quarter. The instruction ran as follows:—

“The grant to be made to each school depends, as it has ever done, upon the school's whole character and work. The grant is offered for attendance in a school with which the Inspector is satisfied. If he is wholly dissatisfied (Article 50), and if the reasons of such dissatisfaction are confirmed (Article 51 E), no grant is made. You will judge every school by the same standard that you have hitherto used, as regards its religious, moral, and intellectual merits. The examination under Article 48 does not supersede this judgment, but presupposes it. That article does not prescribe that if thus much is done a grant shall be paid, but unless thus much is done, no grant shall be paid. It does not exclude the inspection of each school by a highly educated public officer, but it fortifies this general test by individual examination. If you keep these distinctions steadily in view you will see how little the scope of your duties is changed.”

The House would agree that if these principles were acted upon, not only would the schools throughout the country be firmly grounded in that which was admitted to be the basis of all learning, but the higher essentials of religious and moral training, order, and attention to those studies which opened and enlarged the mind, as, for example, geography, and such history as could be taught in a few years, or in the form of reading lessons, would be as well secured under the Revised Code as under the former system.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the causes which, in his opinion, had contributed to the lull which had taken place in the ardour of the promoters of education. Without disputing the existence of some of those causes, he could suggest one cause which was more powerful than them all—he meant the unwillingness evinced in many places to go on with the great educational work of 1839, from the distrust created in the minds of managers by the treatment they had received at the hands of the Department. From all he could learn of the state of opinion throughout the country, he thought there was growing up in the minds of those who took an interest in education a feeling that there was no sympathy for them in the Department at Whitehall; that they were there looked upon as plunderers of the public purse, as greedy harpies who desired to get as much as they could out of the Exchequer; and that the Department which they formerly regarded as their auxiliary and protector only viewed them as its enemy, and was contriving by every means in its power to diminish the grants by which their efforts were to be assisted. That was a most unfortunate impression to get abroad, yet it was one not without justification from the acts of the Department. To some of those acts the right hon. Gentleman had himself alluded at considerable length. First, as to the supplementary rules. There were two reasons why the supplementary rules needed a more ample defence than the right hon. Gentleman had offered for them. One of those reasons was the time at which the rules were issued. It was a characteristic of all the great changes in the educational system of late years, that they had always been reserved till the moment when Parliament disappeared. Those great changes were not brought forward in the spring, when the feeling of managers could be ascertained and expressed in Parliament. The Revised Code had been brought forward in July or August, and now those supplementary rules which had so modified that Code had also been left for July or August. Now, what was the effect of this? The House would remember the severe contests which had taken place in respect to the Revised Code, and which terminated in a compromise. One of the most material points in that contest was that the test of age was no longer to be applied, but that the children were to be taken as presented by the managers of the schools. Trusting to the good faith of the Department, which the right hon. Gentleman told them—almost he thought with some irony—was its characteristic, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) withdrew his proposition; and though the right hon. Gentleman had, he believed, a large majority at his back, he consented to let the experiment, so modified, come into practice, and the Code became practically a law. Was he wrong in saying that the arrangement of which the children were to be taken as they came was one by the material points of the compromise? He held in his hands the words of Earl Granville, and he supposed it was not possible to bind the Department by a stronger pledge than the words of its head. Earl Granville said—

“With regard to the mode of examination, the grouping by age was given up; and what was now proposed was, that instead of four standard examinations two should be added, making six standard examinations altogether, and the children were to be examined according to those standards in the manner in which the managers or masters should present them.”

That was the distinct statement of Earl Granville, and that pledge had been directly broken by the supplementary rules. Instead of being taken as the managers presented them, the managers were obliged to present them in certain standards fixed by the office, and a heavy pecuniary fine was levied on them if they did not so present the children. As he understood the figures, in nearly 97 per cent of the schools the managers had been unable to comply with those supplementary rules. Were those supplementary rules necessary? The House would see that according to the rules of the Revised Code—no child in a successive year being allowed to be examined in the standard which he had been placed in the year before—if the Committee of Council had waited for six years, as the children came up from standard to standard they would have had what they wished, and there was no occasion for that arbitrary and harsh rule. The course which the Department had adopted was one of inducing the managers of schools to invest their money in additional undertakings, then suddenly coming down upon them without notice with a rule for which they were unprepared, and thus depriving them of that in the hope of which they had pledged themselves for payments which often they were very badly able to meet. There were other cases also which had weakened the faith of managers in the Department. He did not know whether managers of schools would continue to entertain the hopes with which they flattered themselves when coming under the sceptre of the right hon. Gentleman; but he would venture to express a hope that if the right hon. Gentleman meant to issue any new rules or minutes by which he intended to mulct those managers of what they received, he would at once make a clean breast of it, and inform the House what he proposed to do in August. Let not hon. Gentlemen be sent back to the country under the impression that a certain code of regulations was to be adhered to, and then when it was too late for remonstrance find out that there was an entire change of regulations. There were many other points with respect to which the right hon. Gentleman must be well aware there was great discontent. There was the question of evening schools. Would the House believe that in many cases the Department required as a condition of aid to evening schools that the scholars should appear in the daytime to be examined? Why the very object of an evening school was to enable those who were not able to attend in the day to receive an education in the evening. He had heard of places in which the Committee of Council had directed the examination of evening schools to take place in the month of May. Evening schools were essentially a winter institution. In summer there was but little chance of getting those who attended them together, so that the Department fixed a time of day and a season of the year when it was impossible that the children should come together. There was one part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which he had heard with regret. He wished the right hon. Gentleman had let the National Society alone. It was very well known that unhappy differences had existed between the National Society and the Privy Council Office; but he thought the right hon. Gentleman had narrowed the issue very much and very unfairly in the way he stated them. It was not merely a question of a few children being allowed to go to church or not being allowed to go to church. What the difference was he believed to be this. There had for many years been a persistent effort on the part of the officials of the Education Office to get rid of the necessity of teaching a direct, clear, sharply defined form of religion. He believed those who worked the system at Whitehall would be glad if some system of amalgamated religion could be devised, by which the denominational principle would be done away with and the difficulties of the Department shelved for ever. Against this the National Society had protested. They believed there could be no earnest religious zeal unless it was based upon a particular religion, and that in an earnest and religious zeal were the whole bone and marrow of the educational movement of this country. If the Government once discouraged men of earnest religious principles from taking part in education, the whole spring of education would go. He therefore thought it would be wiser of the officials of the Education Office to refrain from trying to make religious men abandon the dogmas and the tenets which they held, and to oblige them to teach a mere diluted and general religion. By some of the regulations, there was a direct premium to managers of schools to teach religion in some form to which parents who were Dissenters would not object. There was a direct premium to amalgamate Dissent with the Church of England. He ventured to think that if the right hon. Gentleman held by the principles acted upon by his predecessor in this matter, he would foster an opposition to the Department which even his ability and kindliness of heart would not enable him to overcome.

MR. WALTER said, it was not his intention to move any Resolution on that occasion in the direction of those which he had moved in the last year and the year before; nor should he trouble the Committee with many remarks. But he wished to take that opportunity of saying that, even on the showing of the Privy Council, the great inequality which still existed in the distribution of the Parliamentary grant was most unsatisfactory, and deserved the serious consideration of the House. He also wished to give notice, that should his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Department and himself be in their respective places in the following Session, he would move for a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances of the unassisted schools and the best mode of bringing them within reach of the Government grant. He thought it could not be considered satisfactory that there should still be 10,961 parishes without annual grant schools. The Privy Council in their Report had tabulated the parishes throughout the country, and had divided them into four classes—namely, the parishes with upwards of 5,000 inhabitants; the parishes with less than 5,000 and more than 1,000 inhabitants; the parishes with less than 1,000 and more than 500 inhabitants; and the parishes with less than 500 inhabitants. Of the parishes with more than 5,000 inhabitants 91½ per cent, according to the Report, contained one or more annual grant schools. Then, by tacking on the next class of parishes—those with less than 5,000 but more than 1,000 inhabitants—the Council made out that nearly four-fifths of the parishes of 1,000 inhabitants and upwards contained one or more annual grant schools. But if the House would allow him to make a different division, and separate parishes with more than 5,000 inhabitants from those with less than 5,000, they would find that out of 14,249 parishes containing less than 5,000 inhabitants each, with an aggregate population of 9,291,170, there were no less than 10,961 parishes, or upwards of 66 per cent of the whole, without annual grant schools. No one could contend that that was satisfactory. There was no other instance in which so large a sum of money was voted out of the annual taxation of the country for local purposes in such a way that only about one-half or two-thirds of the population received any benefit from the expenditure. If the parishes which were thus assisted paid for their schools out of their own rates he should not have a word to say; but they took money out of the pockets of the smaller parishes, which got no grant at all; and yet a great number of these smaller parishes were substantially fulfilling all the requisites of education, though, because they were either unable or unwilling to comply with certain arbitrary rules laid down by the Privy Council, they were deprived of any share in the expenditure. It had been thrown in his teeth by the Inspectors—at the instigation, he presumed, of the Privy Council—that he was anxious to apply some portion of the grant in aid of schools wholly undeserving of assistance, and he must say that the Inspectors had shown great fidelity to their employers in raking together a number of utterly worthless schools, kept by drunkards, by persons with one leg or one arm, and so on, and assuming that that was the class of school which he was anxious to assist. Now, he had never said one word to countenance any such doctrine. The doctrine which he had ventured to lay down had always been that which was understood to be the very foundation of the Revised Code—namely, payment by results; and he contended that the inspection, if it were good for anything at all, ought to be able to prove these results. Any Inspector who knew his business could tell in the course of an afternoon what the discipline and moral condition of a school were. He had had an opportunity of seeing a school examined—an Inspector having been sent down to visit his own school, which had no certificated master—and he could, therefore, speak with more authority than he formerly possessed as to the nature of the examination. He said distinctly that any Inspector accustomed to his business could tell in an afternoon what the condition of a school was, and whether it was entitled to a grant; and he maintained that the proof of a schoolmaster's claim to assistance was the condition of his school, and not any examination which he might undergo at Christmas or any other time under the direction of the Privy Council. One point of very great importance was brought out forcibly in the Report, and to this he wished to call attention—he meant the condition of the pupil-teacher system. He had always complained of the rule of the Revised Code, which either rendered the employment of pupil-teachers compulsory, or subjected the managers to loss of the grant if they did not employ pupil-teachers. Now, it was right that the Committee should know what was the state of the case as regarded the pupil-teachers. In the first place, as to their intellectual status, Mr. Brodie, one of the Inspectors, had on several occasions dwelt very much upon the knowledge of grammar possessed by the pupil-teachers, and last year he stated his opinion in the following words:—

“I noticed in several of the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors for last year complaints as to pupil-teachers' grammar, and in a former Report I also called attention to this point. I regret to add that I do not think them improved in this respect. As a body they have no notion, I will not say of composing (the term is too exalted), but of making any simple statement, describing any intellectual process, as of the operations in arithmetic, answering any question, either orally or on paper, in a short, clear, grammatical way. Their papers generally, indeed, disclose far worse grammatical faults, from which they do not get free even in their fifth year—at least, very often—while they retain also strange idioms of their own.”

Such was the knowledge of grammar possessed by the boys and girls who were considered indispensable to any good system of education in this country, and of whom he believed there were still 24,000 on the staff. It seemed, however, from the account given by Mr. Brodie, that the system was breaking down. That Inspector gave a frightful list of the number of pupil-teachers disabled by sickness during a very short period. Out of 542 to whom he referred, 214 had been disabled by sickness, and many of them had died. Mr. Brodie said, indeed, that, though it was not his own opinion that pupil-teachers as a rule, and if properly selected and watched over, were overworked, many other persons most competent to judge, such as physicians, surgeons, and the most thoughtful among the managers and teachers in his district, held a different view. That statement was not to be wondered at, and in the appendix to the Report of Mr. Brodie, who was, on the whole, an advocate of the system, some striking letters were to be found on the subject. One of his correspondents, a Mr. Steele, said:—

“I think my girls have all been most tried in the institution. I have had nine there, and all have come away with their constitutions greatly shattered with the exception of two. I do think the study there is quite too much for any young person to bear. Some of them left me quite strong, and came back completely worn out in mind and body.”

Mr. Rowntree wrote—

“My observation at Hope Street has convinced me that the work which our pupil-teachers have to perform is excessive, and that the majority of young men cannot stand such work without injury to health, while not a few are deterred from becoming pupil-teachers by a knowledge of what they would have to perform. If by the present system you secure a higher standard of literary acquirement, it is, I believe, often at the cost of that freshness and elasticity of spirit without which there can be little sympathy with children, and no great success in the imparting of knowledge.”

Such being the case, he was not surprised at the statement made by Mr. Moncrieff, who, in his Report for 1863, said—

“On the whole, it seems that pupil-teachers are likely to disappear, or be reduced to a very small number, confined, probably, to a few town schools. There is no evidence as yet that they will be replaced to anything like the full extent by second or assistant masters. The causes are chiefly two—the increased scarcity of candidates and the still greater scarcity of funds. It is in vain to tell managers that the pupil-teachers will pay for their stipend by the increase of the grant; the answer is conclusive; on the one hand it is more than doubtful whether the services even of a good pupil-teacher will increase the grant by £10, which is equivalent to twenty-five children passing in all subjects; on the other hand, this is at least uncertain, and school committees are seldom in a position to incur certain liabilities on the strength of contingent, not to say improvable, income.”

That being the case, as reported even by the Inspectors themselves, he thought it would be wise if his right hon. Friend could dispense with that regulation at least which rendered the employment of pupil-teachers all but compulsory on school managers. He wished, in the next place, to say a word or two respecting the mode of examination—a subject which was referred to by Mr. Matthew Arnold in his Report. This gentleman observed that the new method of examination did not afford Inspectors the same means of drawing out the children and of ascertaining really what they could do that was afforded under the old system; and when he (Mr. Walter) lately had an opportunity of seeing a school inspection, it struck him forcibly that that was the case. If it were not a breach of confidence, he might add that the Inspector was very much of the same opinion, and observed to him that under the new system of examination it was impossible to get at the intelligence of the children, to ask them questions which would draw out their minds and prove what they really understood, so well as under the old system of inspection. The children were required to read a certain number of lines, to do a sum, and write a copy, but as to putting any question which would test their general knowledge and understanding, nothing of the kind was attempted, and when he (Mr. Walter) suggested that such a course of examination might as well be attempted, the answer was that there was no time for it, and that it would be impossible to get through the work if that system were pursued. He should postpone what he might have to say on that and other points connected with the subject, but on a future occasion he hoped to enter more fully into the question, and should certainly move for a Committee to inquire into the best mode of bringing all the unassisted schools within the reach of the Government grant.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, that following the example set by others, he would confine his remarks to a few objections which he entertained to various parts of the educational system, and especially to the proceedings of the past year as reported in the papers just laid before the House. On two occasions he had brought under notice the course pursued with regard to the endowed schools. On one occasion he was so strongly supported by the opinion of the House, that the Government were obliged to modify their proceedings. On the second occasion, when he protested even against the modification, he believed with the right hon. Member for Droitwich, that he was only defeated by an accident. Believing that if the House attended for a moment to the subject they would alter the minutes passed by the Committee of Council respecting endowed schools, he wished to announce his firm intention not to rest until he had convinced the House that the minutes must be withdrawn. He could not believe that the House would for an instant countenance the rule that schools being supported by private contributions and by Government aid, where private persons had secured their own private contribution, the Treasury should step in and reckon any such secured private contribution in relief of the public charge. That was a proposition which he believed could not be maintained. He hoped on the earliest occasion at the meeting of Parliament in the following year, that the question would be brought again before the attention of hon. Members, the forms of the House precluding the possibility of their raising it a second time during the present Session. If it should not, however, be brought again before the House, and if the principle were really to be established, that the moment a man's subscription was secured that subscription was to be regarded as belonging to the public treasury, they ought, in common justice, to pass a law enabling those liberal individuals by whom contributions had been secured to schools, to cancel the deeds which they had drawn, and place their subscriptions upon the same footing which they occupied before they had met with such rough treatment. He had several exceptions to take to the practice of the Department, and the first matter to which he would advert was the issuing of supplementary rules. He would give one or two illustrations, though it was chiefly to the principle that he objected. The principle had been laid down that "supplementary rules stand to the code in much the same relation as cases decided under a statute to the statute itself." The Report from which he quoted those words was signed by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President; but he presumed the Report was rather that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. [Mr. Lowe: No!] Decisions of the Judges, however, were simply interpretations of the law, and not, as in the case of the supplementary rules, additions and alterations. Unless the House abrogated the functions which it possessed, the decisions of the Judges could be nothing more than the determination of doubtful intention, and when once decided the decision was recorded and considered so fixed amongst Judges, that no other Judge ventured to alter it except upon very strong grounds. In no case in England did a Judge pretend to vary a law, or make a new law. That power existed in America to a certain extent, but that was only the result of the imperfections of democratic legislation. Supplemental rules were not justifiable then if they ever departed from or added to the minutes they intended to supplement. It was hard enough to understand the minutes, confused, complicated, and obscure as they were, and their concoction was quite sufficiently removed from the control and cognizance of the House; but it was still worse to have supplementary rules besides, which in every respect were open to greater complaint. Take, for instance, the supplementary rule about an imperative standard under which children were to be examined. All that the Revised Code said upon the subject was that every scholar was to be examined according to one of the standards, and that no pupil was to be examined a second time on the same standard. The Report which came out the same year, and which was meant to be explanatory of the law, went further, and said that children were to be presented for examination according to standards selected by those interested in their success. The supplementary rules stated still further that no grant would be paid to a school, not being one for evening scholars or infants only, unless one class was presented as high as standard 3, and that a deduction of at least one-tenth would be made from the grant to a school unless one class was presented above standard 3. He maintained that the supplementary rules were not capable of defence if they went further than the terms of the minute, which they pretended to supplement. He would mention one or two other cases, though in the state of the Committee (about sixteen Members were present) he should not go into the subject as fully as he might otherwise have done. He might, however, say, that complaints were made by the managers of schools in all parts of England of what they considered to be a departure from the understanding conveyed by the Revised Code. But besides these supplementary rules, there was another way of altering the code, and that was by means of instructions. One of these papers, issued in 1862, contained forty-one instructions. One of them, No. 7, directed that an infant school, forming part of a larger school under a certificated teacher, must have a certificated teacher itself. At the close of the letter the intention appeared; it was to bring the infant school as well as the larger school under certificated teaching. But if this object were good it ought to have been carried out, not by instructions, but by a new minute. There was a condition introduced without the knowledge of any one, which condition in many cases had a penal operation. He recollected reading one letter from a clergyman, the tone of naïve remonstrance in which greatly amused him. The writer complained that the nature of the grant had totally changed from what it was under the Revised Code, and he was told in reply that he did not appear to be acquainted with a certain letter of 1863. The clergyman frankly confessed that he had not seen the letter, and had never even heard of it. Laws issued in the course of twelve months did not even come under the notice of the House until the following year, much less could a country clergyman be expected to be thoroughly acquainted with them. There was a stipulation in the Revised Code as to the number of pupils for whom one pupil-teacher was required, and it was expressly stated that the number was to be reckoned according to the average attendance at the school. But the 37th instruction stated that the attendance was to be decided by "the largest number of scholars present at one time together." That alteration would press most severely upon the rural schools, which, in reality, ought to be dealt with the most leniently. The attendance at one season of the year would naturally be much larger than at another. He had now only one other objectionable mode of proceeding to mention, and that was the circulars, which he regarded as being quite as objectionable as either the supplementary rules or instructions. In the Revised Code of 1862, Articles 123 and 124 provided that the allowances to normal schools in respect to each student examined should be so much for the first year and so much for the second, without any reference to the fact of their being Queen's scholars or not. In the edition of 1864 those two articles were omitted, and this omission was explained in a circular which was issued several months before in 1863 from the secretary's office, in which it was said that it was thought necessary to explain those two articles, and that they really meant that no candidate who failed to pass the examination for admission should gain the grant to the college on his account as a certificated teacher. That made a most material difference, whether it were right or wrong. There was this fact also to be observed in connection with the circular which explained the article in question, that it anticipated the decision of 1864 by six months, the secretary who issued it taking upon himself to pass a Minute in anticipation six months before it came out. He also observed that in the Report it was stated that the grants for evening schools were still under consideration. He had received many letters of complaint that in other respects there had been a material departure from the conditions laid down in the Revised Code; for instance, that the number of days during which evening schools must be open had been considerably increased, and the conditions rendered much more severe. Now his proposition had always been that supplementary rules and alterations, whether issued in circular letters or by instructions, if they amounted to an alteration in the minutes which had been sanctioned by the House, should be put forward in the shape of new minutes, and submitted to the House. He went still further, and contended that it was most essential that some steps should be taken to make the House more acquainted with the introduction of new minutes. He would wish that the Minister, having laid upon the table a new minute, should give notice that he had done so; but he had been told upon the highest authority that it was not usual to pass a rule to compel a Minister to make a speech. It might be difficult to prescribe the exact form, but he thought there should be some way of making the House aware that a minute had been laid upon the table, which, if not objected to for a month, should become law. Then, as to a passage in the Report referring to the National Society, he, being a Vice President of that Society, wished to say a few words. The Report seemed to say that the terms of the National Society in some places excluded public grants, and that the grants would have been larger this year had it not been for those terms of the National Society. He presumed that it was meant that the Education Department felt that it could not properly vote public money to exclusive schools—to schools that were so exclusive in their terms as to shut out the children of

Dissenters in places where the population was not sufficient for two schools. Supposing that to be the principle intended, he would observe that that principle had never been distinctly laid down, and it would be much better, in his opinion, to lay down definite and intelligible principles than to enter upon long and inconclusive correspondence with the National Society. That, however, would be assuming that the terms of the society were exclusive, which he denied. In cases such as were referred to he knew that in practice the children of Dissenters did make use of those schools. It might be said that if such were the case why did not the society take credit for their liberality and say so; but there was an obvious reason. The society was willing to admit Dissenters' children, but if they were to advertise that every Dissenter might make an objection to his child following the ordinary religious teaching in the school, it would be inviting objections which would impair the efficiency of these schools. The society was willing to meet objections when they were made, but they did not want to bind themselves and invite interference. At the same time he was willing to agree that the Department should lay down a rule that places, where there was not population sufficient for two schools, and where there were Dissenters who wished to send their children to school, should not receive a grant of public money without the conscience clause being introduced in the deed. He wished to call attention to another point—one to which he had referred upon former occasions—the removal of some public schools from the Educational Department to another. That evil was, he was sorry to find, still on the increase. In the Report he found it stated that pauper schools and industrial schools were now placed under the Home Office and the Poor Law Board, on the pretext that the reasons which dictated the association of the Education Department with those schools no longer existed. He should think rather all schools supported by public money should be placed under the control of the National Educational Department, which would produce a complete Report and lead to a simpler system of inspection. It was difficult to understand why there should be separate Inspectors for the Home Office, the Poor Law Board, and the Education Department, to visit different schools in the same town. Such a separation of account also placed it almost beyond the power of the House to know how much money was expended altogether on schools. In conclusion he wished to congratulate the Vice President, or rather the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor—the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe)—upon the satisfactory remarks of the Inspectors upon the working of the Revised Code. He had himself supported the changes made in the Education Code, and had never foreseen the disadvantage which some had anticipated would flow from its adoption; but he had not expected that so early as 1863 all the Inspectors—as far as he had seen—in their Reports should express such strong approval of that measure of which many of them had felt great misgivings. With the cordial co-operation of the Inspectors additional vigour would be imparted to local management, and the result would be a useful check on the expenditure of public money. He hoped the Department would take into consideration the recommendations made that evening for a more uniform system of working, and for making more prominent all intended changes of rules, and he had no doubt their efforts would be rewarded by a great advance in the cause of education.

MR. HADFIELD said, he was almost at a loss to conceive what was the cause of the apathy observable on a question of such great importance. During the last hour the Benches opposite had been occupied by only three hon. Members, although the Vote under consideration involved an expenditure of £1,300,000, while the Ministerial side of the House could only show a number which he would not specify lest it might be a provocation to the arrest of public business. He believed the apathy was caused partly by the deadening effect which money granted by the State invariably produced, and he was of opinion that it would be much more satisfactory if the State would leave education alone.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE observed, that the theory of the hon. Gentleman that diminished interest was owing to the largeness of the sums voted did not hold good in all points, for they were discussing Estimates which were considerably less than those of former years. The sum they were then called on to vote was £705,000 as against £804,000 last year, and £840,000 two years ago. The decrease was no less than 16 per cent on the whole sum granted for the promotion of education. But while there was that reduction on the Vote for education as it stood two years ago, the expense of the administration of the system had increased 17 per cent during the same period. The year before last they had voted £66,299 for the expense of the office; last year the expense was £72,000; and that year it amounted to £77,800. That increase was a little remarkable, and might give some clue to the solution of the difficulty proposed by the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman said the interest had diminished, and that was explained by the fact that the House found itself unable to deal with the matter, and more and more at the mercy of the Department which administered the grants. The House had, as well as it could, expressed its views and enforced them on the Government, but only to see them quietly set aside, having no power to resist what was going on. Hon. Members, therefore, gave it up very much as a bad job. There were one or two points in the dealings of the Committee of Privy Council during the last two years which were unsatisfactory. Against some of those dealings he considered it necessary to enter a protest. He did not wish to find fault with the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President, or with the right hon. Gentleman the late Vice President (Mr. Lowe), who, he thought, had very hard measure dealt to him by the House. He was not disposed to use severe language either with respect to him or to the administration of the office; but they were dealing with a system which was excessively complicated and difficult to understand. The House had not been able to apply its mind to all the details of the system. It was absolutely necessary, therefore, that a great deal of trust should be reposed in the administrative body; and so long as there was a want of harmony between the House and that body there would be continual complaints. There were two points to which he would direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, which very much affected managers of schools. It should be remembered that managers of schools were not mere blood-suckers endeavouring to get all the public money they could for purposes of their own. They were men labouring, giving their time, money, and abilities to carry on a system which they deemed for the public good. The particular system they were administering was not invented by them. It was created and forced on them by the Government. It was the agitation in that House, aided by the Committee of Council, which led to the establishment of schools on principles which two years ago were universal as regarded all the schools connected with the Government. The Report of the Committee of Council admitted the propositions which he had laid down. The Department thought it desirable to inculcate the whole country with its system of training masters and pupil-teachers and other modes of promoting education, and these were engrafted on the old system of education in the country. What was the consequence? The managers incurred responsibilities both moral and pecuniary. Then in 1862 the Department of the Government which had fostered that feeling swept away the old system, and adopted an entirely new one. In these circumstances the Government should have been as tender as possible in their dealings with those who had been placed in this position in order to carry out the views of the Department. An effort should have been made to make their position as little painful as possible. He was sorry to say very much the reverse of this had been the case. The managers had contracted obligations with the masters, and also with the pupil-teachers. When the Department came to alter the system, how did they deal with each of these cases? The managers found themselves bound at the time to secure certain payments to the master, which payments had been fixed with reference to the mode which the Department had adopted with regard to the augmentation of salaries. They had agreed to give a salary of £40, because they knew there was an augmentation of £20 from the State. There were also pupil-teachers who received payment from the State. The right hon. Member for Calne said he would endeavour to meet the case of the masters by making it a condition of the grant, that the managers of schools should give to the masters a certain amount of payment, which amount should be adjusted to the amount of their former payment from the Department—that was to say, that the managers should pay to the masters three times the sum that the augmentation grant represented, so that if the augmentation grant was £20 they were bound to pay him £60. Then came the question with regard to pupil-teachers, and after some consideration and discussion the Government proposed to continue them to the end of their apprenticeship, and pay them the same as they otherwise would have been paid, and that their salaries should be paid as a second charge out of the earnings of the school. And further, that if the earnings of the school, according to payment by results, were not sufficient to meet the charges for the pupil-teachers, the Government promised to make good the deficiency. The interpretation, and the natural interpretation, that was put upon the two offers of the Government by nineteen-twentieths of the Members of that House and the managers of schools was, that if the school had earned a certain amount from results, the portion which the Government had proposed to secure to the masters should be first paid to them, and afterwards the amount due to the pupil-teachers, the Government making up any deficiency that might arise. To the astonishment of the managers, however, the Government said otherwise. They said the first charge was—and he could not really use any other word—mere moonshine, and that the only charge they considered themselves bound to pay was to make up any deficiencies that might arise with regard to pupil-teachers, which thus became practically the first and only charge. An illustration of the consequences following from the course the Government had taken was afforded by the case of the school of St. Ive, at Liskeard. The Rev. Mr. Hobhouse, writing to the Committee of Council on Education, said—

“Our school and its master satisfy every condition of Article 51 B, and he has, therefore, under that article, a claim upon the grant now received, amounting to £31 10s., the value of his certificate under the Code of 1860. When he shall have received this, there will remain in our hands out of the grant now announced by you the sum of £9 18s. But the pupil-teacher has a claim (as second charge under Article 54) for his stipend of £17 10s., and the master for his gratuity of £5 for instructing the pupil-teacher. There thus appears a deficiency of £12 12s.”

Mr. Hobhouse wrote to ask that these twelve guineas might be paid over, but the Privy Council refused to do so. That, he feared, was one case out of a large number of a similar character, and on a former occasion he gave notice for a Return of all the refusals that had been made under the Revised Code of the same kind; but he was told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, as no doubt would have been the case, that it would entail a search through a large amount of correspondence, and it would put the Department to a deal of trouble—which he had no wish to do—that there was no distinction in the principle in all the cases, and that there were several of them; and he (Sir Stafford Northcote) fancied there were a great many of them. [Mr. LOWE: No.] At all events there were several, and they all turned upon the same point—namely, that the master was ignored, and the pupil-teacher alone recognized. He had given the subject his serious attention, and he had examined carefully all that passed in Parliament on the subject. Some discussion took place upon it last Session, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne gave him an answer on the subject; and he (Sir Stafford Northcote) was bound to say that, after carefully looking into all that had passed, he could not say that the Department had been guilty of anything in the nature of a breach of faith in the case, but at the same time he thought there had been harsh and severe treatment adopted towards the managers. In point of fact, by the requirements of the Privy Council the managers were placed in a difficult position, for they were bound to continue payment to pupil-teachers whom they had not themselves engaged; and there was a case illustrative of the difficulties sometimes arising within his own knowledge. It had not been brought under the notice of the Privy Council, and never would, because the person primarily interested was well able to bear any claims that might be made. The school was supported by a country gentleman in a small parish; it had worked extremely well, and attracted a number of children from other parishes. After a time the manager asked and obtained leave to take first one pupil-teacher, and then a second; and, after some time, the school grew to a considerable size, and the master received payment for both those pupil-teachers. When the Revised Code was issued the master became alarmed, but the manager promised that he should be no loser, and that they would tide over the difficulty. But when they came to settle accounts, having only seven months to deal with as the inspection on account of the change had taken place unusually early, the manager found that he had lost his capitation grant of £14 or £15 a year, and though 95 per cent of the children attended and passed their examination he had to pay nearly £20 to the master to put him in the same position as before. That was the case of a school wealthily supported, and no complaint had been made, but suppose the case had been one of a parish school in a remote district, where the loss must fall either on the master or the clergyman who could not hope to raise additional subscriptions. In the case he had mentioned the two pupil-teachers were just under their time, and by restricting the operations of the school a little, the manager would eventually get back pretty much to his old position. But cases constantly arose where for three or four years the pupil-teacher's apprenticeship had still to run, and it was during those periods that consideration was most needed. He did not ask any favour for managers, or that they should be bloated with money; but when by a course of legislation they had been brought into a certain position and saddled with obligations from which it was impossible to withdraw with honour, it was but charitable and just that Government should make such arrangements as would enable them to tide over the difficulty. Had the propositions of the Government been carried out in the way they were understood by the House and the country, he believed the dissatisfaction and complaints which had arisen would have been entirely obviated. He rejoiced that the attendance in the Committee was limited that evening, for last year, when he brought forward the question in a full House, it was impossible to gain the attention of hon. Members. How was it possible to expect that 500 or 600 Gentlemen would enter into all the minutiae of that widely ramified system? Many considerations led him to believe that they were erroneously endeavouring to achieve a complicated work by a centralized administration, and that the difficulties could not be met unless they were prepared to enter upon a different system. [Mr. ADDERLEY: Hear, hear!] He knew what was meant by the cheer of his right hon. Friend; but that field of discussion was too wide to be entered upon just then. He would pass to another point—that of the standards; and he must say that there he did charge upon the Department something as near to a breach of faith as was consistent with the habits of the Board. How they could reconcile to their consciences having put out these supplementary Estimates he was at a loss to understand. An opinion expressed by Earl Granville in the House of Lords had been quoted. In the debates in the House last year, the subject of grouping by age was a good deal discussed. Much might be said both for and against grouping by age. The House was, however, opposed to grouping by age, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) gave way, and stated that a system of payment according to standard would be adopted. [Mr. Lowe: Examination according to standards, not payment.] On that occasion Mr. Puller, whose death was a great loss to the House, put certain questions to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject. Mr. Puller was alive to all the difficulties and intricacies of the subject, and he asked the Vice President of the Council whether it was right that John Thomas, a boy of the first-class, but very young, should be presented for a standard below that of the first-class. It was obviously for the credit of the school that as many boys as possible should present themselves for the first-class, but it was for the pecuniary interest of the school that he should be at first in as low a standard as possible, and present himself for a higher standard afterwards. The right hon. Gentleman, in answer to the question whether it would be in the power of the master to place him in any standard, said that it would be so, but that when he had been once placed the minute would take hold of the child and fix his position. From that question and answer and the debate altogether the Committee had a right to assume, that it would be in the power of the managers of schools to present a child upon any standard they pleased on the first occasion, and that they would not be bound by rules contrary to the statements made in that House. And yet the supplementary rules, that professed to be an exposition and explanation of the Revised Code, went into minute details that rendered it utterly impossible for any child to be presented for a different standard from the class in which he was examined. He would not go into the policy of such a regulation; he only contended that it was a violation of the understanding arrived at by the House. When hon. Members found, after so many nights' attendance and discussion, that it was impossible to bind the Government to an understanding so distinctly come to, it was sufficient to account for Houses as thin as that of that evening. He wished to press upon the Vice President of the Committee of Council that he must consider the feelings and infirmities of those with whom he had to deal. The present was an artificial system. He should have preferred a somewhat different system, but that which existed was a centralized system administered by a body sitting at Whitehall, and knowing very little of the feelings of the managers of country schools. He trusted that the present Vice President would lay aside that primness and stiffness that almost of necessity belonged to an official system. He did not sympathize with all the indignation felt against the Education Department by the country managers. But the Privy Council had no doubt sinned on the side of unnecessary harshness, sharpness, and severity towards the managers, who were giving a great deal of their time and money to the work of education. He would entreat the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. A. Bruce) in his official administration to endeavour to smooth over the suspicions and feelings that had been excited, and to give peace again to a body of men who were labouring in a good work and assisting in the education of the poor.

Mr. BLACK said, he might as soon find his way through Bradshaw's Guide as attempt to master a Revised Code which hardly a dozen men in the House understood. The hon. Baronet who had just sat down truly called it an artificial system, and said they all knew from the complaints that were made how difficult it was to work out the rules and regulations of the Board. Perhaps some explanation of these complaints would be found in the distribution of the grants. The sum devoted for education in England and Scotland was £721,391. Of that large sum the Church of England schools received £416,392, while all the other schools in England only got £137,670. Now, would any one tell him that the members of the Church of England were as 416,000 to 137,000 of the population? The difficulty arose from the whole system being denominational. In Scotland the sums distributed were—to the Established Church, £52,477; the Free Church, £39,897; Episcopalians, £4,476; and the Roman Catholics, £2,230. The total exceeded £99,000, of which the Established Church got more than half. To say that the Established Church had one-third of the number of children was giving it a large allowance. The Free Church and the United Presbyterians were each of them near it in numbers, and nothing could be more unfair than that it should have more than half the grants. The Episcopal Church got £4,476, and the Roman Catholic only £2,230. Now, the wealthiest persons in Scotland were Episcopalians, while their number was very much smaller than that of the Roman Catholics. It appeared from the Census that there were eight marriages among the Roman Catholics to one among the Episcopalians; which shows that the Roman Catholics were greatly more numerous than the Episcopalians, and they needed aid most; but, for all that, the wealthy body with the smaller number of children got twice as much money from the State as the poorest and the more numerous class. Now, as the whole system seemed to him one of inequality, and therefore of injustice, it was high time to look into it. If a plan could be devised by which they could have one school in every parish or educational district, it was not necessary that it should be called Church of England, Presbyterian, or denominational of any kind: were this disregarded, it would be so much the better. If he were a manager he would take the best master he could find, no matter to what denomination he belonged, whether Quaker or High Church. There would be some difficulty with the Roman Catholics, but there would be none in getting Protestants of all denominations to read the New Testament in the school, and then, if a man of sound religious principles, no matter what sect he belonged to, were put at the head of it, religion would be better taught than when the master was obliged to teach the children some sectarian creed. The denominational system was not successful in teaching religion, and therefore he would have no creed at all taught in the school; that might be done by the clergyman or parents at other times. But according to the present system they gave grants to those who did not want them, and withheld them from those who did. He had taken great interest in a ragged school where Roman Catholics and Protestants were taught together; but they could not get a small sum from the Board to enable the school to be maintained. The Board said, "If the children are paupers, let them go to the poorhouse; if they are criminals let them be put into gaol." At the last examination of the school he made some inquiry into their funds, and found that more money was got for the school through the Industrial School Act than they had actually asked for before; but he found that it was got in this way—some of the children were brought up before the magistrates for petty offences, and then, when they were branded as criminals, a grant was given for them. But would it not have been better to save the children from the brand which, through the fault of some, to a certain extent, was attached to the whole school?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I have listened with much attention to the interesting discussion which has taken place upon this subject, and I confess that I am glad to see so thin a House upon the occasion; because I do not think it possible to have a good practical discussion in a crowded House upon a question in the abstract so dry. I have no desire to enter at any length into the subject after the able speeches that have been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and the hon. Member for Edinburgh. But there are nevertheless one or two points upon which I am desirous of saying a few words. Now it appears to me that, from some cause or another, the present system of National Education is regarded throughout the country with dissatisfaction and distrust. I am not disposed to attribute this dissatisfaction and distrust to individual feeling, but rather to the system itself. But while I am conscious of the defects of the system I am willing to admit that it is very difficult, after a certain system has so long existed and grown up to such an extent as the present one, to tear it up by the roots, and substitute for it another system of a wholly different character. If the evils complained of could be corrected without resorting to so strong a remedy, no doubt such a correction would be most desirable, and I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has a great opportunity before him. The whole of this interesting subject has been dealt with in a most able and argumentative manner in the Report of the Royal Commission. There is scarcely one of the defects of the system that is not boldly handled, and if the right hon. Gentleman would but direct his attention to that Report, with a determination to act as the really responsible head of the Department of Education, I believe that he would find that the recommendations of the Commissioners afforded elements for the engrafting upon the present system material improvements which would go far to correct the evils so generally complained of. I heard with much satisfaction the notice which was given this evening by the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), an-participating as I do the most beneficial results from the Committee of Inquiry which he proposed next Session to move for. The fact that the unassisted schools derive no benefit from the grant is one of the most serious character. It is a mystery to me how hon. Members representing in this House the whole of the population, can consider it consistent with their duty to vote away nearly one million of money taken from taxes contributed by the whole population, and devote it to the interest of not more than one-half of them. I think it is inconsistent with our duty to give our consent to a distribution of the public money so partial and unequal. If there be one cause more than another which leads to the total neglect of a great portion of the population, it is, I believe, the excessive centralization of the system. I have again and again entreated the right hon. Gentleman opposite to reflect upon this fact, and have said that I do not believe that you will ever get the education system satisfactorily worked until you have largely called local assistance to your aid. We employ local assistance in almost every other branch of our administration; why, then, should we exclude it in regard to National Education? I believe that the elements of local assistance exist at present in a manner deserving of our consideration. I allude to the diocesan boards now established in almost every county, and which I think might be made available for the carrying out of the system. I have thought if a plan could be framed by which those diocesan boards could be brought into harmonious action with a central department, that you might rapidly organize a system which would go far to correct a grave defect—namely, the want of the assistance to those small schools which cannot at present come into your terms. If you will look to the Report of the Royal Commission you will find some such suggestion made. I think that this suggestion is well worthy the consideration of the Government before the arrival of the next Session, when a Committee of Inquiry will be moved for by the hon. Member for Berkshire. Such a question could not be placed in abler hands than that of the hon. Gentleman, who has so long distinguished himself by the manner in which he has promoted the cause of education. I am quite sure that if that Committee be moved for, neither the Government nor this House will refuse it. Before, however, the time arrives for that Motion, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider whether he cannot obviate the necessity for such an inquiry by proposing some scheme which will correct the evils which have been so often adverted to, and which it is impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to deny. My hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) has alluded to another subject, which is well worthy the consideration of the Government. I mean the present system under which new minutes are from time to time laid upon the table. I think that we ought not to submit to the continuance of this system, believing it to be open to grave objections and serious inconvenience. Now the 150th and 151st sections of the Revised Code were passed in order to give security against the possibility of surprise; notwithstanding which, I think we have reason to complain of the many and sudden changes that are made from time to time in the system. It appears to me that whatever new minutes may be thought necessary during the year, they should not be made until the month of January, when they might be embodied in the new Code, and then laid before Parliament, so that Parliament should have a full opportunity of considering the changes. Unless such a construction is put upon those articles I confess I see much evil arising from them. It is impossible to expect that the attention of this House can be constantly directed to those frequent changes from day to day and from month to month, indicated by the new minutes laid before the House, while it would be a great advantage if it were understood that there was one particular period of the Session when the Minister of Education would draw the attention of the House to any proposed change. There is one other subject to which I wish to allude. I mean the question of the conscience clauses. An important correspondence has taken place, and been laid on the table, between the Government Department of Education and the National Society. Now, I feel I should be shrinking from my public duty if I did not say that I think the Committee of Council are essentially right in requiring the insertion of those clauses. I deeply regret the part which the National Society has taken in this matter. It is very painful for me to be compelled to declare my disapprobation of any part of the conduct of a society to which the country is so much indebted for the admirable spirit and zeal in which for many years it has promoted education. Nevertheless I feel compelled to say I think that the position which the National Society has taken up in respect to these clauses is wholly indefensible, because they require all schools to conform to their terms of union. Now those terms preclude a minority of Dissenters from benefiting by those schools. The answer of the National Society is, no doubt, "We have given you a discretion." But I consider that it is impossible to accept this answer, because I look upon it as really no answer at all. How unfair it is to those who act under the terms of the union to say you have a discretion! One clergyman finds it perhaps consistent with his conscience to avail himself of that discretion. But another says "I feel myself bound by the terms of union, and must act upon them." I will go so far as to say that this defence resorted to by the National Society really, I think, aggravates the case, because it makes the case of the Dissenter of one parish different from that of another. I trust that the day may come when the National Society will see fit to put an end to this state of things by altering their charter and the terms of union. At all events, it appears to me that the Committee of Council are only doing their duty in pursuing the course which they have taken.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he fully concurred in the expression of regret uttered by the right hon. Baronet, that the National Society were not inclined to relax its rules, which were inconsistent with the existing circumstances of the country; but he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that a general system, which he believed the people would not assent to, should be attempted to be introduced throughout the country. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Department would attend to some of the remarks which were made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, and, if possible, introduce some improvements into the system. He had no objection to the appointment of a Select Committee early next Session, nor did he think that the Motion for such a Committee could be in better hands than those of the hon. Member for Berkshire, and, therefore, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would have no difficulty in assenting to its appointment. He must, however, object to the notion that it was possible to abolish the present system, and substitute for it one of general rating, to the entire exclusion of the voluntary principle. He did not deny that the present system was capable of any improvements, but he believed that his right hon. Friend near him had introduced many valuable changes which, if they were followed up, would bear good fruit.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that the idea of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black), that there might be a religious education without creeds or anything denominational in its character was impossible of realization. The hon. Gentleman suggested that the children should read the New Testament; but there were many texts of the New Testament as to the meaning of which the children might inquire, and of which it would be impossible for a teacher to give any explanation without touching upon controversial ground. Religion entirely freed from denominationalism would sink into mere indifferntism, and indifferntism was mere Deism or no religion at all. It could not be Christianity, because that must be definite. The secular system was open to equal or still graver objections. It would be impossible to give more than the mere rudiments of instruction without raising some questions of religion. Take, for instance, the study of modern history and the great question of the Reformation. The only way to carry out such a system would be to sink religion altogether, and teach history and other things to which religious considerations were essential without those essentials, the result of which would be to lead the children to regard religion as a matter of no importance whatever. He believed that the system which existed in England, the denominational system, was the best that could be adopted; and one proof that it was so was to be found in the fact, that the National system of Ireland, which was based upon a diametrically opposite principle, had by the force of circumstances been compelled to adopt to a great extent the denominational form. Any attempt to restore to it its original character would make it to a great extent inoperative. They ought to be thankful for the denominational system in England, and the more the Irish system was assimilated to it in that respect the more satisfactory it would be.

MR. BLACK said, that in Scotland there were very excellent schools where religion was taught without reference to creed at all.

MR. LOWE said, that situated as he still was in regard to this matter, he would very much rather have taken no part in the debate: he felt, however, that it might be deemed unfair if he left his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council to answer for his misdeeds, and he therefore rose to offer a few explanations on points in which the administration of the Committee during the last year had been impugned. As to the controversy which had broken out between the hon. Members for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) and Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) he might observe that the justification of the present system, if it had any, lay not in any abstract principle but in the necessity of the case. It was the will of the country to have a denominational system. It was not worth arguing the question, for it was, as it seemed to him, a political necessity. That being the case it followed that as the denominational element was not strong enough to support itself, and as the House would recoil from the expense of maintaining out of the public purse three or four schools in the same place to suit different denominations, some compromise must be effected, and the result was the present system by which the schools were supported partly from one source and partly from another. The necessary consequence of that state of things was a central administration, with, on the one hand, all the complexity and difficulties which had been pointed out; and on the other a very partial expenditure of the public money. Until wealth, generosity, and public spirit could be made equal all over the country, and as long as the grants were dependent on voluntary contributions, there must necessarily be inequality. There might be Committees without end; but if they started from the position of the denominational plan they would never get rid of that fundamental and insuperable difficulty. To complain of inequality was to cast blame, not on the administration, but on the system itself. As to the question of the supplemental rules raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote) in his very temperate and candid speech, he contended that the Committee of Council did not exceed their authority in issuing these rules. The original proposal of the Committee of Council was grouping by age—that the examination of children should be conducted not according to classification in school, but according to age. That proposition was violently opposed in the House, and the Government saw fit to give way on it. In the end it was arranged that the children should be examined in six standards, and that the managers should put them in these standards. The terms of the proposal were exceedingly vague, and could hardly of themselves embrace the whole working of the system. Experience proved that such was the case. The first thing pointed out to the Committee of Council was that a boy might be in age below the highest class, and yet by his diligence and ability might have reached the highest class. By the rule, however, he could not be examined in a standard twice, and the school would lose his grant for the next year. The Committee of Council therefore relaxed the rule to meet that case, and announced that they would allow the boy in question to be put below the place he would otherwise occupy, to be put down a class or two, so that the school should not lose anything by his precocity. Another point was that an Inspector who found a school deficient in instruction had the power of reducing the grant by not more than a half or less than a tenth. As the rule stood, it was possible that it might be eluded altogether, for a schoolmaster might place all the children in the lowest standard, where they would only have to read words of one syllable, to enumerate figures, and to write single letters, and then claim the grant for his school. It was certainly not the intention either of the Government or of Parliament that such an abuse should be permitted. The Committee of Council issued no new rule on the subject, but merely exercised their power under the Revised Code to make a deduction from the grant if a schoolmaster placed all his children so low that there was none above the second standard, taking that as evidence that the instruction was not what it ought to be. It was quite clear that the practice of placing children so low was an infraction of the rules agreed to by Parliament, and it was right that the Committee of Council should have power to check the unfair acquisition of public money which might be attempted by construing the regulation loosely or in bad faith. Many admonitions had been addressed to his right hon. Friend the Vice President. He would not, however, presume to admonish him from his side, because he was sure it was not necessary to tell him that though it was his duty to conciliate the managers in all fitting ways, he had also a duty to discharge towards the taxpayers; and unless a man in his position kept a strong firm hand on the expenditure, and unless he was prepared to brave some degree of public obloquy and expose himself to much trouble and vexation, he could not fill the office with honour to himself or benefit to his country. His hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) had also raised a question as to the rules concerning the payment of masters. He could not expect that the House would allow him to go into the details of the matter, but he would try briefly to explain it. The rule referred to was made for the protection of the masters, and for that object alone. Before it was adopted, a master was entitled to be paid an augmented grant by the State, and ran no risk of having any of it misappropriated. That advantage was lost when the master was left to make his own terms with the managers. There was supposed to be a danger—an imaginary danger, no doubt—that the money might not reach the teacher through the managers; and it was agreed that he should have a charge on the money to the amount of the augmentation, and that if he were not duly paid by the managers the Government should stop the grant or pay so much of it over to him. That provision was given exclusively for the benefit of the masters. Subsequently, however, the arrangement was made that the pupil-teachers should be paid by the Government if the grant was not sufficient. That rule, which was not contemplated when the other was made, gave quite a new complexion to the system. The managers became anxious not to pay the masters in order that by an appearance of exhausted means they might get payment for pupil-teachers. The rule, therefore, had been construed, not as it was intended, for the benefit of the masters, but for the benefit of the managers, who were thus enabled to obtain from the Privy Council an allowance to which they were not entitled. With regard to evening schools, in order to obtain a grant, it was required that a pupil should attend so many times, but nothing was said as to average attendance. The Code being silent on the subject, the Committee of Council determined that forty sittings of the school should be deemed an average attendance. That was, it appeared to him, a fair and reasonable proposal. Other smaller points had been started into which he would not pretend to go. Allowing for the immense difficulty of managing these things, and the absolute necessity of protecting the public revenue against any blot in the regulations, a free, liberal, and not a jealous construction should be placed on the rules of a Department which had to deal with persons so anxious to get the largest possible share of the public money, and so acute in studying the system in order to attain that object. With regard to the complaint as to the minutes, as far as he was concerned, he would be satisfied that no minute should be altered except by Act of Parliament. He was tempted to sympathize with Lycurgus, who made his laws and then told the Spartans to obey them till he came back, which he took care not to do. Without saying that all the measures of his time were good, or all the legislation perfect, he believed it was not likely to be improved by anything that could be forced on the gentlemen at the head of the office by the House without a single exception. Every interference of the House with the Department had been with the object either of reducing its efficiency or increasing the expenditure. It was said the Department was unpopular, and probably the reason was because it administered with so much strictness the funds committed to its control. The Education Vote amounted in 1861 to £840,000. It was going on at the rate of nearly £100,000 a year, and but for the most obnoxious regulations which were introduced by the enemies of the human race who presided over the Department, it might at the present moment have reached £1,200,000 or £1,300,000 instead of £700,000, and have swallowed up that penny in the Income Tax which everybody was so glad to see taken off. When, he might add, the administrators of the Department were charged with being prim, and precise, and harsh, and with having very little feeling for the unfortunate persons whose receipts might be cut down, it ought to be borne in mind that they were exercising a great public trust, and that while, on the one hand, the education given did not suffer in point of efficiency since the changes which were so much complained of had been introduced, on the other hand, a stand had been made on behalf of the taxpayer, and those demands resisted which would infallibly have broken down the whole system, which had, he contended, got a new change of life by the alterations in question.

Mr. LYGON admitted that the system, as administered by the Council of Education, was unpopular, but that was because it had lately put itself out of harmony with the spirit of the taxpayers of the country; and the real secret of the distaste with which it was regarded was, that while it professed to accept the denominational system as a political necessity, the whole efforts of the Committee and of its subordinates had been mainly directed towards breaking down the denominational system. He thought it would be far more satisfactory to the taxpayers at large if the regulations respecting these grants were embodied in a definite legal form, and not based on such a nebulous system of minutes. The denominational system would be far preferable to that now sought to be introduced. What was the principle of that system? Why, that the State undertook to aid the efforts of the various schools throughout the country, in union with the two or three great religious societies of the country. Much obloquy had been cast during these discussions on the National Society, but its object had been forgotten. The object of this Society was not merely to teach the multiplication table, but to educate the poor in the principles of the Established Church. That was the great trust confided to the Society, and he thought that great credit was due to those who had laboured to check the unpopular proceedings of the Privy Council on Education. He thought that education, to be worth anything, should be founded on religion, and that principle had been distinctly approved by the House of Commons. The teaching of reading, writing, and arithmetic did not constitute education. Education, to be good for anything, should teach a man his duties to God and to his neighbour; and it was impossible for any body of professing Christians to touch this subject without the inculcation of definite principles as to religious teaching. Religious education was a fundamental principle with the people of England. No doubt some confusion had arisen from mixing up the denominational system with the voluntary system. He regretted very much that the Committee of Privy Council made their various aggressions in the way they had. The National Society was subject to aggressions and humiliations which no other body in the country having charge of education were subject to. It was extremely desirable that the Educational grant should be administered with strict impartiality; and an impression largely prevailed throughout the country that the members of the Established Church were not treated with strict impartiality. In their efforts to establish schools they were subjected to pressure, to terms, and to suggestions; and hindrances were thrown in their way which were not extended to members of any other religious community. So long as that was the case, so long would dissatisfaction exist, and so long would the Committee of Council be unpopular. He did not for a moment believe that the members of the Church of England, whose zeal and liberality in the cause of education were well known, and who made large exertions and sacrifices for that cause, were animated by such sordid notions as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) attributed to them.

MR. PUGH said, he wished to make some remarks with reference to that part of the country with which he was connected. He had observed with great pleasure that it was stated in the report of the Inspector in South Wales, which had lately appeared, that that country had made great progress in education, even since the Revised Code was established. It was right that this should be made known, because great doubts existed at the time whether that would be so, and whether some of the schools would not be injured. In that respect the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne had proved a true prophet; for he very kindly said, when these difficulties were pointed out, that the Welsh children were remarkable for their intelligence, and would overcome all obstacles. If there was one part of the speech which he had just made which he (Mr. Pugh) had listened to with less pleasure than another, or from which he might venture to differ, it was that part of it in which he gave it as his opinion that nothing could be done to remedy those evils of the present system which had been so forcibly depicted, whereby large tracts of country were left untouched by the Education grant. If those evils were felt in a rich country like England, much more must they be so in the remote and rural districts of Wales. They were forcibly exhibited in a Return moved for by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, showing that large cities and towns absorbed vast sums, while rural districts were comparatively unprovided for. He, therefore, hoped that something would be done to take their case into consideration, and if it was found to be irremediable, the managers would then have the satisfaction of thinking that their grievance had been fairly inquired into. They had no wish to get any of the public money for nothing—

Mr. Lygon

Haud facilem esse viam voluit ;"

they knew this ; they duly appreciated the difficulties by which they were surrounded, and were prepared to struggle with them.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £97,582, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the General Management of the Department of Science and Art, of the Schools throughout the Kingdom in connection with the Department, and of the Geological Surveys of Great Britain and Ireland, &c."

MR. GREGORY said, he did not intend to go on with his Notice for calling attention to the management of the institution at Kensington. If he were to call attention to the improper manner in which the purchases were conducted, according to the latter paragraph of his Notice, he must ask for a Committee of Inquiry, and at that late period of the Session he should not be willing to serve upon a Committee of Inquiry himself, nor should he find it easy to induce any other hon. Gentleman to do so. He hoped, however, that the Vice President of the Education Committee would look into the matter during the recess, and that it might be unnecessary for him to demand such an investigation next Session. Meanwhile, he could not refrain from calling attention to some portions of the Vote now before the Committee. In one item, the amount of which was no less than £16,000, a whole host of subjects—examples, diagrams, objects of art, catalogues, &c.—were huddled together in a manner which gave facilities for manipulating the public money in a way that should not be tolerated for a single day. The whole item might as well have been put at once under the head of "et ceteras." He wanted to have each item set clearly and distinctly before the Committee, so that every one could ascertain at a glance what sum had been spent on each object of art, and what was the exact amount of expenditure under each head. He was asking for nothing out of the way, or what was not required from any other Department. Nothing could be clearer, or more correct, than the manner in which the Votes were taken for the British Museum, and he saw no reason why the same plan should not be followed in the case of the Kensington institution.

He was also of opinion that some explanation should be given of certain recent purchases for Kensington—he thought they trenched rather on what belonged to other departments. Some time ago a fresco was bought for £480 ; but it was perfectly obvious that a purchase of that kind, if made at all, ought to have been made for the National Gallery. The excuse for it was that the fresco represented certain costumes, and that it was consequently suited to the meridian of Kensington. But if that were an excuse, pictures of the old German and Spanish schools might be purchased ; in fact, a complete picture gallery might be established at Kensington. Recently, too, large sums had been given for the drawings of Mulready for the School of Design. He did not say it was improper that the drawings of Mulready should be purchased for the nation, nor did he assert that they were not fitted for a School of Design ; but if they were to purchase drawings of that high class and at that high price, the Kensington people might just as well buy drawings of Raphael and the other great masters—they were just as appropriate to a School of Design. Kensington had likewise made a purchase of antiquities which ought to have been secured for the department of the British Museum, and in this instance a formal and serious remonstrance had been presented to "My Lords" of the Treasury by the trustees of the latter institution. Surely nothing could be more absurd or irregular than for two public establishments to compete with each other for specimens of the same description. He did not deny that it might be necessary to have some objects of classical art in the School of Design, but then he would suggest that such objects should not be purchased for the Kensington establishment except after communication with the British Museum, and even then, if possible, by an officer of the latter institution. Only two persons, in fact, should be allowed to have anything to do with purchases. Their respective provinces should be distinctly marked out, the one having to certify for all objects intended for modern art, and the other to certify for all objects intended for mediæval art. If that were insisted upon, and if those officers were brought before the Board when there was business to transact, instead of leaving matters to be dealt with by long reports, they would get rid of many of those irregularities which were being freely commented on by the public, which were adding to the weight of odium now daily increasing against the department at Kensington, and which, sooner or later, he believed, would arouse such a feeling of indignation in that House that the whole concern would be swept away—a result which he should most sincerely regret. He should reserve the statement which he had intended to make till the next Session, when if matters did not mend in some respect he would certainly ask for a Committee of Inquiry into the whole of these proceedings.

MR. H. A. BRUCE admitted that it would be more convenient and more conformable to the usual practice if the item of £16,000 in this Vote were divided under different heads. The charges of his hon. Friend on other points were not sufficiently distinct for him to grapple with them. With respect to the purchase of the fresco, he understood that the National Gallery did not purchase frescoes, and he thought the department would have been wrong in neglecting an opportunity of purchasing a beautiful specimen of this class of art when they had the opportunity of getting them at a cheap rate. So in regard to Mr. Mulready's drawings, they were copies well fitted for study in the schools, and the money paid for them had been extremely well laid out. A thorough understanding existed between the British Museum and the department at Kensington in respect to purchases. Whenever doubts arose, as must occasionally happen, whether articles ought properly to be purchased by the one or the other, in all those cases a conference took place between the two bodies. The department did not profess to purchase classical antiquities as such; but many of those antiquities bore closely on the progress of art, which progress it was their object to illustrate. It would be impossible to conduct those purchases so as never in any individual instance to leave room for hostile criticism; but the collection, as a whole, was of immense value, and if brought to the hammer to-morrow would fetch far more than it had cost.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that at the Kensington Museum there were a number of beautiful specimens of Italian art, and he should like to know how they were come by. That Museum always reminded him of the shop of a receiver of stolen goods. He was afraid that many of the beautiful works there were the fruits of what was called the "moral support," but what he ventured to call the "immoral support" which the noble Lord at the head of the Government gave to the revolutionary party in Italy who plundered churches and religious houses. He was afraid that our Government had somehow got hold of some of the property so acquired. ["Oh!"] The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs cried "Oh!" but that was no answer. Chief Justice Hale said that the receiver was worse than the thief; and he should be sorry if this country was placed in that category. In the Kensington Museum there was a sedan chair, a beautiful work of art, which belonged to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, with whose name it was ticketed. What business had they with that? They had purchased it with notice; they knew to whom it belonged. Did they buy it of Garibaldi? He should confine himself to that sedan chair, and must ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell them something about it: how they got it, whether they intended to send it back to the rightful owner, and, if not, why not?

COLONEL W. STUART wished to know if the hon. and learned Baronet had ever seen the beautiful collection of pictures in the Vatican at Rome? Because a great many of these pictures had been taken from their owners by the French and afterwards given up to the Papal Government. That Government had not restored them to the original owners. In keeping them was it, according to the hon. Baronet, a receiver of stolen goods?

MR. BAZLEY said, that great dissatisfaction was spreading in the country at the rigid economy practised towards the provincial schools of art, while extravagant sums were given to the school at Kensington. Such an inequitable mode of distributing that Vote would not, he believed, be tolerated much longer.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH called attention to the great increase which took place annually in this Vote. In ten years it had more than doubled. In order to test the opinion of the Committee on the subject, he should move that the Vote be reduced by £15,000, the increase this year.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £82,582, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the General Management of the Department of Science and Art, of the Schools throughout the Kingdom in connection with the Department, and of the Geological Surveys of Great Britain and Ireland, &c."—(Mr. Augustus Smith.)

MR. MAGUIRE thought the Vote required the grave consideration of the Committee. He denied, in the most emphatic manner, that the collection at the Kensington Museum was an advantage to the country generally, and he appealed to the Members of the Select Committee whether what he had stated was not correct? It was professed that the travelling museum, consisting of a very few objects of very little value, was sent to England and Scotland to promote a taste for art; but it was a very ingenious but not ingenuous proceeding of the authorities, to send the exhibition to Dublin at the time of the Agricultural Show, and, although it did not attract in the face of the superior attractions of the cattle show, to take credit for bringing the people to the Irish capital. The provinces had been starved in order to make a rare show of the Kensington Museum. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Galway would next Session probe this evil to the bottom.

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not consider it was the business of the Government to teach science and art, and they certainly had proved that they were not competent to do it. He did not think our collections of pictures and of articles of art should be frittered away between the National Gallery, the British Museum, and the establishment at South Kensington. He would have a National Gallery worthy of the nation, and then would send all the pictures to the National Gallery and all the works of art to the British Museum.

MR. AYRTON said, that up to this time he had been under the impression that the Department of Science and Art confined itself to the collection of the odds and ends which make up the exhibition at South Kensington. But it would seem that the Department was now applying itself to literary pursuits, in order to combine science, art, and literature. It had just taken a literary turn, and had published a book entitled, Mumbo Jumbo; or, the Mountains of the Moon in the Gaboon. He had had the misfortune to read that production, and certainly it was the most remarkable compound of nonsense he had ever perused in his life. At first one might suppose that there was some concealed wit in it—some lurking fun or humour in it; but there was none. It was a concatenation of nonsense such as might be expected to come from a combination of children of twelve years of age writing a dramatic sketch under the superintendence of some grown person devoid of sense. The thing would not deserve any consideration but for one circumstance. A well-conducted and respectable person connected with the Museum had been asked, whether it was true that he was to take a part in the representation of the drama of Mumbo Jumbo; or, the Mountains of the Moon in the Gaboon; and whether, in order to make himself more interesting in the eyes of the enlightened audience, he was to make his face as black as a coal? He replied that this performance was under the patronage of the Coles, and that it would be necessary for him to blacken his face to that extent, even though he might look foolish. He said he had a wife and children and had no chance—he was compelled to make a fool of himself on the occasion. Under these circumstances, he had to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether public servants at South Kensington, who might be respectable considering the salaries they received, had been obliged to blacken their faces and take a part in the coarse, monstrous, and senseless performance that he was told had taken place in the Botanical Gardens? He did not know whether hon. Gentlemen had been present at the performance, if so, the House might have the advantage of hearing a better account than he had been able to give of the affair. He had only read the production. That was quite enough to make him avoid the Botanical Gardens on the occasion. It was really a serious thing if respectable public servants had to make fools of themselves. Such a proceeding would be in the last degree degrading to our sense of public decency, and to the refinement and feeling which was supposed to exist in this country. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the House an assurance that the Science and Art Department would not embark in literary pursuits or dramatic performances.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that the questions which he had to reply to were almost as various as the objects in the South Kensington Museum. First of all he must assure his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets, that the performance to which he referred had no connection with the South Kensington Museum; certainly the sums included in the Vote had not been applied to any such purpose. Then the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Basley) had objected to this collection that it was confined to the metropolis. Now that was an objection that would apply to every metropolitan collection. As to the proposal of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) to remove all the pictures to the National Gallery, a great number of the pictures at South Kensington were by contemporary artists, which class of works were not admitted into the National Gallery, and there were bequests, such as the Sheepshanks Collection, to which was attached a condition that would prevent them from being exhibited in the National Gallery. As to the reduction proposed in the Vote, he would remind the House that the buildings which it was necessary to finish in order to accommodate a valuable collection had already been approved of. It would be premature to discuss a question that was at present being considered by a Select Committee; but having read the evidence already taken by that Committee, he might remark that there was a great deal of testimony strongly favourable to the maintenance of the schools at South Kensington and to the Museum itself. He hoped the Committee would not consent to adopt the Amendment.

COLONEL SYKES directed the attention of the Committee to the fact, that there were large items to be voted which it was not fair to charge to the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. There was £47,000 for Schools of Art in the United Kingdom. The item for buildings had increased from £11,000 to £24,000, and the grant for the Royal Dublin Society had increased by a sum of £700.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the question was, whether the country schools got their fair share of the purchases? But the discussion was premature because the subject was now before a Committee upstairs, and ought to be left open until they had reported.

MR. HENNESSY, referring to the statement that Ireland was not fairly treated in respect of this expenditure, said, that among the successful candidates for the Queen's medals in the Science Examination of 1863 were, in physics, Joshua Doherty, a student of the North of Ireland, who carried off the gold medal, and Cornelius O'Sullivan, a student from the South of Ireland, who carried off a silver medal. In chemistry the gold medal was won by Richard Geogan, and a silver medal by John Conolly, both students of the South of Ireland. In geology the silver medal was obtained by Robert Smith, and the second medal by George Donaldson, both students of the North of Ireland. In botany a silver medal was obtained by Elizabeth Maffet, a student of Belfast, the second by Lizzie Carson, also of Belfast, the third by Marianne Johns, of Carrickfergus, and the fourth by Samuel Stewart, who was also an Irish student. This showed not only the ability and industry of the Irish students, but also that they got fair play from the Department.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that anything more discreditable to art than the decoration of the building did not, in his opinion, exist in this country. Great dissatisfaction also existed with the purchases made on account of the Museum; but it seemed impossible to find anybody who was responsible for them. Last year a sum was voted for the residences of officials connected with the Museum. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) then said, that when the officials were lodged in those houses there would be a deduction from their salaries corresponding with the annual value of their houses. Had this arrangement been carried into effect?

MR. BUXTON said, that less importance was to be attached to the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) that the decorations were execrable, because it was pretty well known that the hon. Member was rarely satisfied with anything. Persons who were competent to give an opinion, thought the decorations were exceedingly beautiful, and that great credit was due to Captain Fowke, or to those who were responsible for them.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that the Department took to itself more credit than belonged to it, because in the majority of cases the people were not attracted by the travelling museum, but attended for the purpose of seeing the fat pigs, fine horses, and beautiful short horns.

MR. HASSARD differed from the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), and contended that the travelling museum in Ireland had been the source of much gratification to the people of that country, and had more than paid its cost.

MR. GREGORY asked, whether the sum voted for the library had been expended entirely upon it?

MR. LOWE said, that some injustice had been done to the officials of the South Kensington Museum, because perfect responsibility existed there. For the purchases the President and Vice President for the time being were responsible. They were advised by two gentlemen called referees—one (Mr. Redgrave, R.A.) for modern art from 1750 down to the present time, and the other (Mr. Robinson) for ancient art up to 1750. The referees sent in their recommendations; Mr. Redgrave, who was also Inspector General of Art, advised upon them, and the President and Vice President decided. He was sorry that the sense of duty which induced the hon. Member (Mr. Gregory) to propose to call attention to the improper purchases, did not lead him to carry on his investigation before making a statement on the subject. He regretted that the term "improper" should have been employed, because it appeared to imply that there was some disgrace or discredit attached to some one, and the hon. Member should not have used that word unless he intended to substantiate it. The fresco of Perugino was a fresco painting, which, as a specimen of ornament for the interior of houses, was deemed by many a desirable addition to the Museum. The Museum was not, as a general rule, regarded as a receptacle for pictures at all. They were only placed there when there was no room for them elsewhere, or when, as was the case with the Sheepshanks Collection, the donor requested that such a course might be pursued.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that the library in one particular year had shown a balance in the receipts over the expenditure, and that that balance, by the authority of the Treasury, had been applied to the repair of the roads. Residences were found for four officers, and, as the Museum was open until ten o'clock at night, it was necessary to have officers upon the spot. Previous to the building of those residences, two officers were accommodated elsewhere, and that accommodation was regarded as part of their salary. The question with respect to the other two was now under consideration.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked if any part of the £15,000 was to be applied to the decorations?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that the money was strictly applicable to the building.

PENAL SERVITUDE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 167.]—LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Lords Amendments considered, and, with Amendments to one of them, agreed to, as far as the second Amendment, in page 2, line 36.

The second Amendment, in page 2, line 36, to leave out the words, "once in each month," and insert the words, "if required to do so by the conditions of his licence," read 2°.

MR. HUNT said, he proposed to move that the House do disagree with the Amendment introduced by the Lords in Clause 5, and he asked the House to do so with the more confidence, because it had on a previous occasion passed his own Amendment by a considerable majority. The clause, as it went up to the Lords, was to the effect, that if any holder of a licence from the Secretary of State, who should be at large in this country, unless prevented by illness or other unavoidable cause, failed to report himself to the police within three days after his arrival in England, and subsequently once a month at such places and in such manner as the chief officer of police should appoint, he should be guilty of a misdemeanour. The Lords had struck out the words "once a month," leaving the question whether the ticket-of-leave man should report himself at all after his arrival, to the terms and conditions of his licence. The form of licence in the Bill contained no such condition, and therefore the Lords' Amendment would reduce the clause inserted by the House of Commons to a nullity. It was true the Home Office had power to grant licences in a new form, but those licences would not apply under the terms of the Bill. The alteration in the Bill in the House of Lords was made under peculiar circumstances, for two decisions were come to. On the first occasion the House of Lords affirmed the decision of the House of Commons. On the second occasion they negatived that decision, but the attendance was much smaller than on the former occasion. In support of the opinion which he had expressed, he begged to refer to a Report which had been laid on the table within the last two or three days, in which it was stated, with respect to the prisons in Ireland, that the number of reconvictions had not increased within the year, and that the practice of registration and supervision continued to work advantageously; and the Report further stated that, during the many years in which the convict system had been in operation, no instance had come to the knowledge of the Commissioners in which any complaint had been made against any constable, so far as regarded their supervision having prevented any person from getting employment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Hunt.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he hoped the House would agree to the Amendment. He thought it a very beneficial alteration, and had been deliberately adopted after a very full discussion. It would remove the absolute bar that would otherwise exist to the ticket-of-leave man obtaining employment.

MR. MOOR inquired, whether the Government supported the Resolution of the House of Lords that the holders of tickets-of-leave should report themselves to the police once a month?

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, it was his intention to support the Motion for disagreeing with the Lords' Amendment, because if that Amendment was carried it would have the effect of altering the Irish system which had worked so well.

Question put,

The House divided:—Ayes 129; Noes 84: Majority 45.

Subsequent Amendments agreed to.

Committee appointed,

"To draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendment to which this House hath disagreed:"—MR. HUNT, SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, SIR HUGH CAIRNS, MR. ADDERLEY, MR. AYTON, MR. MARSH, and MR. BEACH:—To withdraw immediately:—Three to be the quorum.

GREEK LOAN BILL—[BILL 144.]

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to inquire whether the loan was really a dotation for life to the King of Greece or merely intended to last during the period he remained upon the throne. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a former evening seemed to be under the impression that the treaty was intended to confer the dotation for life; but, if so, that view was directly opposed to the terms of the Bill before the House, and having gone all through the papers on the subject, he felt perfectly certain that they contained nothing to warrant that interpretation. Were the other parties to the treaty equally bound to continue the dotation for life? If so, he had been unable to discover the provisions to that effect. It was expressly described as a personal dotation "to be added to the civil list of Greece." Clearly, therefore, when the civil list came to an end, as it would do if the throne became vacant, the addition must drop as well. According to the treaty made in 1859, a sum of 900,000*l.*, equivalent to £20,000 a year, was to be paid from the Greek Treasury. England's share of that sum would come to about £6,666, of which we had given up £4,000 yearly to the King of Greece, and had voted away more than the balance in salaries to officials. In addition to that, upon the treaty for the annexation of the Ionian Islands, £10,000 a year had been settled upon the King of Greece as a first charge on the revenue of those islands; and what was most extraordinary, the claims of our own countrymen, amounting to £7,000 yearly, had been deferred and made a second charge. A more blundering and dangerous treaty he never remembered. The correspondence relative to the annexation of the Ionian Islands was very amusing. It was stated that the parting of the King of Greece with the then Sovereign of Denmark was an affecting scene. The King of Denmark embraced the young King of Greece and expressed a wish that he would make Greece as happy as Denmark was at that moment. The happiness of Denmark had, however, since been rather disturbed by the proceedings of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office. The Government had made a sacrifice of a large sum, and had obtained no guarantee for the payment of the loan. He observed that a sum of about £250,000 had been remitted to the Ionian Islands for one thing and another. Why did not the Government bring in an Act of Parliament to legalize these remissions as well as the King's annuity? He also wanted to know why the Chancellor of the Exchequer had contended a few nights ago that this was a dotation for the King's life, and had brought in a Bill to confine it to his reign.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that his interpretation of the treaty had been supported by the Foreign Department. No doubt the treaty contemplated the dotation for life. Why, then, it might be asked, did the Bill extend only to the reign, and recognized the contingency that the reign and the life might not be co-extensive? That was a matter of policy and propriety, and the opinion of the Foreign Office was that it would be more becoming and more prudent to draw the Bill only with reference to the reign. The Bill would give effect to the treaty in the present state of things, but he would admit that it would not give effect to the treaty in the event of the termination of the reign, by a revolution for example. It was better that the Bill should be drawn as it was, although it only gave effect to the treaty for a time—namely, while the King remained upon the throne.

Mr. HENNESSY said, he must remind the right hon. Gentleman that he told the House the other night that the Bill ought to be in exact accord with the treaty, and that the House could not consequently consider any alteration in it. The arrangement was a kind of marriage settlement between the young King of Greece and his kingdom, and as marriage settlements were drawn with provisions that contemplated a separation and protected the interests of the lady in that event, so ought the settlement to protect the interests of the King. As the Court of Russia had no Parliament to consult, it would pay £4,000 a year to the King of Greece during his life, and so would the Emperor of the French. Because, however, the English Government had to submit the treaty to the House of Commons, the Bill was drawn in such a way that the £4,000 a year was only payable during the King's reign. Her Majesty's Government had inflicted enough pain already on the family of the young King. He would, therefore, move as an Amendment that the Bill be re-committed with the object of substituting the word "life" for "reign," so as to make it agree with the treaty.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words "That the" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "said Order be discharged,"—(Mr. Hennessy,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. LYGON said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had deprecated on a former night any difference between the treaty and the Bill, while he had now been the first gratuitously to introduce the element of the King's reign not being so extended as his life. The right hon. Gentleman said that the matter had been examined by the Foreign Department. But the House knew nothing of that Department. The matter was proposed upon the responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown, and it was upon them the responsibility must rest. He should support the Motion for re-committing the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken exhibited that confusion of mind not unusual with him at that time in the morning. He had not thrown the responsibility upon the permanent officials of the Foreign Department; on the contrary, when he spoke of the Foreign Department he spoke of the Foreign Minister, and he took care not to separate himself from that Minister, because he stated that he concurred in what he had done. Neither had he "gratuitously" introduced the personal matter with respect to the King of the Hellenes. It was not a gratuitous introduction, but was a statement of the case absolutely necessary to remove a misapprehension which might still exist in the mind of the hon. Member, but had been removed from that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had introduced the subject. The case was this:—There was a claim of the British Government on behalf of certain British officials against the Government of Greece, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Dunne) said, "We will connect it with an engagement to relinquish the £4,000 on behalf of the King of Greece, so that if the claim be not satisfied the King of Greece shall suffer;" but it was his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) duty to show them that the two parties were perfectly distinct; that if the Government of Greece did not fulfil its obligation, that might be a reason for taking measures to compel them, but could be no reason for withholding from the King, in his personal capacity, the sum of money to which he was entitled independently of the question whether he was King of Greece or not. Therefore it was in necessary connection with the subject in debate that he had introduced the matter.

MAJOR HAMILTON supported the Amendment.

Mr. AYRTON said, he was afraid that the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman would not effect the object he had in view, because the Bill was founded on a Resolution of the whole House, and they could not go beyond the terms of that Resolution. That being the case, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be prepared to admit that the view which he took of the question the other evening was not quite correct. It was a personal dotation to the Prince of Denmark, whether he remained King of Greece or not, and therefore it was a separate and distinct grant out of the money belonging to the people of this country, and the precedents which the right hon. Gentleman cited had no application whatever to the subject. The right hon. Gentleman by his own statement had brought the House to the inevitable conclusion that the transaction was a most irregular one. It was a grant of money which Her Majesty had no right to make unless subject to the sanction of that House. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman had made a statement which was quite in keeping with his (Mr. Ayrton's) views, but he could not but regret that the Foreign Secretary should have advised Her Majesty to exercise her prerogative in a manner which was subversive of the privileges of the House of Commons.

Mr. BUTT observed, that it was the practice of the Crown every day to surrender debts to its own subjects.

Mr. HASSARD said, he was of opinion that it would be useless to re-commit the Bill, which was in perfect harmony with the treaty. If he understood the right hon. Gentleman, it was intended to make a personal dotation of £4,000, no matter whether the King should continue on the throne of Greece or not. But the treaty dealt with him exclusively as King of Greece. How was the matter to be carried out if he should cease to be King of Greece? How was the money to be secured to him? There would be no other way of doing it but by coming to that House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it would not have been becoming to anticipate the contingency of the King of Greece quitting the throne, and to legislate for such a contingency; but if it should occur, then the House, no doubt, would be ready to fulfil in good faith the honourable engagements of this country. In the meantime what was proposed was in all respects regular, and if the contingency adverted to should occur, the remission would end. The rights of this country against Greece would then revive, and it would be necessary to make provision in some other way for the personal engagements undertaken towards the King of Greece.

COLONEL DUNNE observed, that what he had complained of was, that while magnificent dotations were given to the King of Greece, proper provision was not made for English subjects. He trusted that some Resolution would be brought forward declaring that in future all treaties of the kind should be submitted in due time to the House.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would, by permission of the House, withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LYGON said, he was not aware that he had done anything to justify the observations which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had passed on his conduct. The right hon. Gentleman in future not to hurry a Bill through the House and leave the discussion on it until the later stages.

JAPAN.—RESOLUTIONS.

EARL GREY, who had given notice of Resolutions to the effect that the relations between this country and Japan appear to this House to be at present in an unsatisfactory state, and to move an Address to Her Majesty thereon, said: My Lords, the subject to which I am about to draw your Lordships' attention is one which has on more than one occasion been under the consideration of the House. Up to the present moment, however, no decided opinion has been pronounced by your Lordships as to the policy which has been pursued in Japan by Her Majesty's Government; and therefore, thinking the time has now arrived when your Lordships should be asked to deal more decisively with the matter, I have placed upon the paper the Resolutions which I shall conclude by moving. But, before I proceed further, I may be allowed to observe that my Resolutions are not intended to imply any censure on the Government. Not that I approve their policy—far otherwise; but what has been done cannot be undone, and while it is very unlikely that I could induce your Lordships to agree to a Vote of Censure, my asking you to do so would greatly diminish the probability of your Lordships being prevailed upon to express a practical opinion as to what ought to be the policy of the country for the future.

The Resolutions I am about to move have, accordingly, been so drawn as not to express any opinion as to the past; they begin by setting forth the various facts of our intercourse with Japan, and they then proceed to state the inferences which I think ought to be drawn from the facts narrated in the papers which have been laid before the House. I trust it will not be necessary for me to take up more than a small portion of your Lordships' time in showing that my statement of facts is correct, and supported by the papers. After a Resolution, which is merely introductory, the second states—

"That it is shown by the papers laid before Parliament, by command of Her Majesty, that the treaty concluded between Her Majesty and the Tycoon of Japan, on the 26th of August, 1858, gives to British subjects in Japan rights and privileges which the Government of that country was avowedly reluctant to grant, and was only induced to confer upon them through dread of British naval and military power."

And the next—

"That the Government of Japan has also been induced by this same fear to make with other European nations and with the United States, treaties generally similar to that which it has concluded with Her Majesty."

I might quote many passages from the despatches to show that the treaties concluded by Japan with the Western nations were not entered into willingly, but were obtained from Japan by coercion; but the fact is so notorious, and has been so explicitly avowed by Sir Rutherford Alcock (whose authority is conclusive) in his work called The Capital of the Tycoon, that it is needless for me to take up your Lordships' time by quotations in support of a statement which can hardly be questioned. The next Resolution proceeds to state—

"That under the above-named treaty British subjects are entitled to claim admission into certain portions of the territory of Japan without being subject to the jurisdiction of its Government, Her Majesty having taken upon herself the obligation of enforcing on their part good conduct and obedience to the law."

This Resolution has reference to the fifth Article of the Treaty, commonly called the "extraterritoriality clause," which is to the effect that Japanese subjects guilty of any criminal act towards British subjects shall be arrested and punished by the Japanese authorities, according to the laws of Japan; and any British subjects who may commit any criminal act against Japanese, shall be tried and punished by the Consuls, or other public functionaries, according to the laws of Great Britain. Your Lordships will observe that this is a distinct stipulation of reciprocity on the part of both countries. We are bound to enforce the good conduct of our own subjects, as Japan is bound also to enforce the good conduct of hers; but, unfortunately, on neither side had that obligation been fulfilled, as neither party has been able to perform what it had promised. The next Resolution I have to submit accordingly is that

“The Reports of Her Majesty’s diplomatic servants show that Her Majesty has not been able to fulfil this obligation; the provisions of the statutes authorizing Her Majesty’s Consuls to try and punish British subjects for offences committed in Japan, and the means available for carrying these laws into effect, having proved altogether insufficient to prevent gross outrages and insults from being inflicted on the people of Japan by British subjects and persons assuming that character.”

Now, I think that those who have paid attention to the papers that have been laid upon the table of the House must be aware that that is not an over-statement of the facts; and I will refer you particularly to the despatch of Sir Rutherford Alcock of the 21st of November, 1859, in which he describes the lawless violence which he says in less than five months after the opening of the trade had become habitual on the part of British sailors and others in the ports of Yokohama and Kanagawa. He states in this despatch that drunken sailors have been allowed to land and go about singly or in bands, offering violence to the Japanese whom they have met, or into whose shops they have intruded. He describes these outrages and the insufficiency of English law to put them down still more fully in his book than in the official correspondence; but the statements contained in his despatches were considered so strong that they produced from the Foreign Secretary a letter in severe condemnation of such conduct on the part of British subjects in that country. A letter was written on the 1st of February, 1860, by Mr. Hammond, to the East India and China Association, under the direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which, after describing the state of things, he went on to say that Her Majesty’s Government had a right to expect that the extension of the commerce of the country should not be neutralized by such proceedings, and that the whole weight of the commercial interests of this country should be brought to bear upon a state of things which was at once discreditable to the British name, and which was incompatible with the successful progress of our trade with Japan. Sir Rutherford Alcock, in his work on Japan, has expressed in strong language his sense of the misconduct of unscrupulous adventurers in that country. He shows that persons of higher position than common sailors have also shown a contemptuous disregard for the prejudices and long-established customs of the Japanese. I fear that the fault extends still further than Sir Rutherford Alcock alleges, and that even our diplomatic agents there are not exempt from this charge. It has been asserted that in spite of the laws of Japan, which impose the penalty of death on firing a gun within a certain distance of the residence of the Tycoon, the members of our Legation have set the example of shooting within the prohibited distance. Your Lordships will find that Sir Rutherford Alcock records in his own book an act which I will venture to call one of the greatest violence and illegality committed by himself. Sir Rutherford Alcock found a private road, leading to a coal mine, the property of one of the Daimios, stopped by a barrier guarded by two sentinels. When he was going to pass the barrier the sentinels endeavoured to prevent him, but, by his own account, he pushed passed them, so that they were unable to stop him without actual force, which it seems they abstained from using, so that he succeeded in getting by. Why, under such circumstances, the sentries, according to the practice of all Europe, would have been justified if they had shot Sir Rutherford Alcock on the spot; and if he had been so shot he would only have got what he deserved. My Lords, I have already mentioned that the treaties entered into by Japan with this country and with other Western nations were not conceded willingly but from fear. It is important to add that this concession was made against the wish of a very powerful party in Japan, which desired at all hazards to maintain the long cherished policy of the Empire by continuing the rigorous exclusion of foreigners. It is not surprising that this party was greatly increased in strength, and that the disposition to receive foreigners kindly, which had in the first instance been shown by a large part of the population, was unhappily changed into a very different feeling by such misconduct on the part of foreigners as I have described; and this misconduct produced a more intense feeling of animosity in Japan than it might have done elsewhere, owing to the peculiar state of society that exists there. Your Lordships are aware that for many centuries Japan has been ruled by a feudal nobility, and that the law of honour is there carried to the greatest extreme. In Japan an insult to an individual can only be washed out with blood. It is illegal to draw a sword there except in self-defence; but the person who does draw it in self-defence is punished with death if he puts it in the scabbard again without having despatched his adversary. The only alternative given to him is that of suicide in the form prescribed by ancient custom. It is scarcely to be expected that a people so sensitive of their honour will submit to outrages at the hands of Europeans. Accordingly, very dreadful crimes have been committed by Japanese in revenge for what they have suffered in that way. The English Embassy has been attacked, and murderous assaults have been made on several British subjects, some of whom have lost their lives. These crimes are referred to in the next Resolution I have to submit to your Lordships, which is in the following terms:—

“That the animosity against foreigners excited in the minds of the Japanese by these outrages and insults has increased the repugnance long felt by the most powerful classes among them to renewed intercourse with European nations, and has led to the perpetration of some murders and several daring and desperate attacks upon foreigners; diplomatic servants and other subjects of Her Majesty having been among the sufferers from these acts of violence.”

In support of what that Resolution asserts, I may refer to despatches of Sir Rutherford Alcock and to an able Report on the state of Japan by Admiral Hope, dated August 20, 1861, and presented to Parliament in 1862. Both these high authorities state that the acts of violence committed by the Japanese arose out of the provocation that had been given, though often it was not the individual who had been guilty of the original insult who became the victim of the revenge it provoked. The murder of the Secretary of one of the Embassies was traced to the fact that the servant of one of the Daimios had been struck by a person connected with the Embassy, and the person who received the blow had been reproached for having dared to appear before his master without having avenged the insult. The next Resolution which I have to submit to your Lordships states—

“That the Government of the Tycoon has professed the strongest desire to prevent the commission of these crimes and to punish their perpetrators, but has declared itself unable to do so; nor does there appear to be any reason to doubt the truth of these declarations, since two Tycoons and a Regent of Japan have themselves been murdered, and one of the principal Ministers narrowly escaped the same fate, owing to the hostility they had incurred from being supposed to favour an increased intercourse with foreigners.”

The accuracy of this Resolution, so far as regards the professions made by the Government of Japan, is beyond question, since the whole Correspondence is full of the expression of their earnest desire to comply with the demands of the British Minister, by affording better protection to British subjects, and by punishing the perpetrators of the sanguinary outrages complained of. Nor is there the slightest reason for doubting the sincerity of these professions; on the contrary, everything combines to show that the Government was totally unable to control the excited passions of that large part of the population which had become bitterly hostile to foreigners. Strong evidence of the sincerity of the Government of Japan may be drawn from what befel those who held the highest posts in it, from their being supposed to be too favourable to foreigners. One Tycoon had been poisoned; another was otherwise murdered. The Regent, in the midst of his guard, was set upon in open day by a band of conspirators, who sacrificed their own lives for his destruction, and succeeded in butchering him, and carrying away his head. A similar attack was made upon the Foreign Minister, who escaped with difficulty, after an affray in which several of his own followers and of his assailants were killed. These things are quite inconsistent with the supposition that the outrages on foreigners could have been prevented by the Government; but the strongest proof of their sincerity is afforded by the fact reported by Colonel Neale. The Government of Japan, in the hope of guarding against collisions which it felt that it was otherwise unable to prevent, had determined to close against its own subjects, and reserve for the exclusive use of foreigners, forty miles of the imperial highway to the capital. Suppose we had been asked to give up forty miles of the Great Western road to foreigners, and go to the expense of making a new road for our own people in order that they might not be exposed to meet these foreigners? In order to make this case intelligible, your Lordships must observe that the old law of Japan allowed no person to remain on horseback in the presence of a Daimio. Our countrymen, however, refuse to obey this law, and claim the right, not only of not getting off their horses when they meet the Daimios, but of riding along the road when they are coming. I do not pretend that the notions entertained by the Japanese on this matter are consistent with civilized ideas; but if Englishmen for their own purposes choose to go to Japan and find among the people certain opinions and certain prejudices which have existed for centuries, I think they are bound to consider those feelings and prejudices in their treatment of that people. What makes their proceedings more offensive is, that by long tradition persons in trade are looked upon in Japan as of an inferior class. In Japanese society the lowest workman and handicraftsman ranks higher than the richest merchant; and, therefore, when our merchants meet these Daimios in the way I have described, great offence was taken by the Japanese. Nor have our countrymen been content to ride along the roads in a manner to violate only an unreasonable law, and unreasonable customs of the people. The Bishop of Victoria in his account of his visit to Japan, describes as highly reprehensible the reckless manner in which Englishmen were in the habit of riding at full speed through the crowded ways, often causing serious injury and sometimes risk of their lives to the inhabitants, and I hold in my hand an official notice issued by the Consul at Kanagawa condemning this practice. In these circumstances, the Japanese might very fairly have said, that in order to prevent collisions it was our duty to execute our treaty obligations, and compel British subjects to respect the law; and it shows no ordinary desire on their part to preserve peace, that instead of doing this they were willing to deprive themselves of the use of their principal road to the capital, and abandon it altogether to foreigners. It is more important to bear these facts in mind, because it was in riding along a road when one of the greatest Princes of the land was approaching that Mr. Richardson was murdered. Undoubtedly this was a violent outrage for which Her Majesty's Government were entitled to ask redress; but still, in my opinion, what they asked as redress was unreasonable, and the measures taken to enforce their demands were contrary alike to the law of nations, to the plainest principles of amity and justice, and to good policy. Though I cannot conceal from you that this is the view I myself take of what has been done, I do not ask your Lordships to adopt it. I have been content to waive the expression of any opinion, and I have strictly confined myself to a naked recital of facts as to which there can be no dispute, in the following Resolution which I have next to submit to you.

"That in order to enforce a demand made by Her Majesty's Government of redress for the murder of a British subject, it was found necessary to undertake hostile operations against one of the Daimios, in the course of which considerable loss was experienced by Her Majesty's ships, and a large and flourishing Japanese town was burnt to the ground."

My Lords, I trust that what I have now said will be sufficient to satisfy your Lordships that the brief statement of facts contained in the first eight of the Resolutions I have laid before you is strictly accurate, and is fully borne out by the papers on your table. It remains for me to show that these facts properly lead to the conclusions which I have drawn from them in the remaining Resolutions of which the next is as follows:—

"That this experience of what has already taken place leaves little hope for the future of its being possible to avert fresh collisions between Her Majesty's subjects and the Japanese if the existing arrangements for regulating the intercourse between them are maintained unaltered; and if such collisions should occur they must sooner or later lead to a war which would necessarily cost many lives and much money both to this country and to Japan, and would probably bring upon the latter the heavy calamities of general anarchy and confusion from the destruction of its existing Government, while there would be no means of creating any other authority to replace it."

In submitting to you this Resolution I would ask you to consider whether there is any ground for hoping, that if the existing arrangements for regulating the intercourse between our countrymen and the Japanese remain unaltered, they will produce any other effects than they hitherto have? Can it be supposed that if British subjects are left in Japan without any effective control either by the Japanese or the English law they will act otherwise than they have done? But, if British subjects continue to ill-treat and insult the people among whom they live, fresh murders will follow, and new demands for redress, which the Government of Japan will be unable or unwilling to comply with, and which we shall think it necessary to enforce. This, indeed, seems to be what is anticipated by Her Majesty's Ministers; for, on the 14th of November, 1863, the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs addressed a communication to the Lords of the Admiralty, intimating that he had instructed Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Japan to take measures for protecting British subjects, and for resenting any outrages upon them, and he requested that the Admiral on the station might receive such orders from their Lordships as would authorize him to act for that purpose, so far as the means at his disposal enabled him to do so. The British Minister is further authorized to send for 500 troops in addition to those already in Japan. But the effect of these instructions is to give authority to the British Minister and Admiral to begin a war with Japan at their own discretion. Now, my Lords, I would remind my noble Friend that, during his own administration, a very strong opinion, and, I may add, a very just one, was expressed by the late Duke of Wellington as to the danger and inexpediency of intrusting Her Majesty's servants abroad with the power of making war without direct instructions from the Government at home. That power is in reality one of far too dangerous a character to be intrusted to the discretion of any subordinate officer. Local circumstances, the opinions of those by whom they are surrounded, and the feelings with which Englishmen are apt to regard semi-civilized nations with whom they are brought into contact, necessarily exercise so much influence over the minds of those who are employed in the service of the Crown in these countries as to render them unfit to be intrusted with the power of involving the nation in war. Her Majesty's Government have recently had calamitous proof of the effect of leaving such large discretionary powers to subordinate officers in what had recently occurred on the Western Coast of Africa. Her Majesty's Government seem also to have formed a most inadequate notion of the difficulties they would have to encounter in a war with Japan. If, unfortunately, we should be involved in such a war, not the 500 soldiers they propose sending there, nor even 5,000, would prove sufficient for the operations it would require. Our wars with China have been attended with heavy expense in money if not in blood. If I am not mistaken, the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated the cost of the last short war at £8,000,000, but a war with Japan would cost us far more both in money and in blood. Its people are of a very different character, and its Government of very different efficiency from those of China. They are a high-spirited people, always accustomed to carry arms of a most formidable character, in the use of which they are skilful. Instead of undervaluing the arts and knowledge of the West, they show an anxious desire to acquire them. Already they have learned to construct steam-engines, and have purchased steam-vessels. They are turning their attention to modern improvements in artillery: it is said, and I believe with truth, that they are purchasing rifled guns in the United States, and are endeavouring to obtain instruction in their use. Nor is it likely that the Government of Japan will, like that of China, allow a British force to wage war with them in one place, while British subjects in other parts of the empire are allowed to enjoy all the advantages of peace and continue their trade unmolested. Judging from what we know of the feelings and the character of the people, we may anticipate that if war is begun it will be carried on by them in earnest, and that our merchants and their property at Yokohama and the other open ports will be exposed to attacks from which it will be difficult to protect them. Bear in mind how large is the value of British property in these ports exposed to the torch of the incendiary, and how difficult it will be to defend English residents from the midnight attacks of men who have shown how ready they are to sacrifice their own lives in order to kill the foreigners whom they hate. The nature of the war we shall have to wage, if we allow ourselves to be involved in it, deserves also to be considered. We shall have no means of carrying it on except by measures which will fall most severely upon the part of the population which is best affected to us. Already in trying to punish Satsuma we have burnt a rich and flourishing town, and if we have to attack other batteries we shall in like manner (either unavoidably or by design) destroy the property if not the lives of the unarmed and peaceable population. And when we have destroyed the batteries on the coast and the trading towns what are we to do next, and what shall we have gained? The Daimios and their armed retainers will probably retire inland, and it requires to be explained how it will be possible to follow them into the mountainous and difficult country which composes the greater part of Japan. What measures of coercion can we bring to bear upon them, and of what use will it be to occupy a few spots on the sea coast, if the rest of the territory is in the hands of those who will then be our bitter enemies. It seems to me, therefore, that while a war with Japan would certainly be attended with a fearful sacrifice of lives and of treasure, there is no small hazard that in the end we might be foiled by an enemy totally incapable of meeting us in the field. But assuming that our arms are as successful as you can desire, it remains to be considered whether the war would not be one in which success would be even more calamitous than defeat. The extension of our trade certainly will not be promoted by burning other towns as we have burnt Kagosima, or by the devastation of the country which will be the seat of war, since the destruction of their property will not increase either the power or the willingness of the Japanese to purchase our manufactures, or to supply us with the commodities we wish to buy. But it is not merely the direct consequences of the war which we ought to regard; we ought also to take into consideration results which, though indirect, would be found to be still more important. If we succeed in overcoming the resistance of the Japanese, the result will in all probability be the exaction of a new treaty imposing more onerous conditions upon the people of that country than they have hitherto laboured under. It is well, in considering the question, to glance for a moment at the effect of such treaties. What has been their operation in China? When we first employed our arms to establish closer relations with that country some twenty-five years ago we found the empire peaceful and prosperous, its provinces in a high state of cultivation, and supporting a numerous and a happy population. But by the effects of our wars the authority of the Government in China has been completely broken down, and a state of anarchy has been brought about which has caused the deepest misery throughout that vast empire. Provinces which, on our first entrance into China, were rich and flourishing, are now utterly ruined, hundreds of thousands of human lives have been sacrificed, and in the newspapers of this day I find the latest accounts from China state that some provinces are so completely ruined that the inhabitants have been driven to support life by that last and most dreadful resource—cannibalism. The same process is now in its first stage in Japan. If our present policy be persisted in, it will not be many years before all the authority of the Japanese Government would be entirely destroyed, and we should not be in a position to substitute an authority in its stead to maintain order throughout that extensive empire. A successful war with Japan can hardly lead to any other result. Its institutions are not such as to withstand the effects of defeat, and it is the nature of Asiatic Governments to be easily overthrown, while it is impossible when their strength has once been broken to re-establish their authority, or to create another to take its place. Such are the grounds upon which I submit to the House that it is our duty to avert these evils, and therefore I propose a Resolution—

“That, apart from all higher considerations, the true interests of this country, and especially its permanent commercial interests, require that such calamitous results should not be risked by maintaining the existing treaty with Japan unaltered, and that it is desirable that the provisions of this treaty should be so modified as to place the future intercourse of the two nations on a better footing for the future.”

The truth of this assertion can hardly, I think, be disputed, and, if not, I think there can be no objection to the next Resolution which I propose—

“That it would therefore be advisable that Her Majesty’s servants should without delay enter into friendly communication with the Government of Japan and with the Governments of other nations having treaties with Japan similar to our own, for the purpose of determining what changes it would be expedient to make in the provisions of these treaties.”

In this Resolution I have not ventured to prescribe what modifications should be introduced into the treaty, as I do not consider that it falls within the province of Parliament to do so, since it properly belongs to Her Majesty’s servants to consider in the first instance what changes might advantageously be made. When they have made up their minds as to what changes it would be desirable to make in the treaties with Japan, it would be well to have an understanding with other civilized Powers, and especially with France. If the concurrence of these Powers could be secured, after the experience of our power which the Japanese have recently had, there would be little difficulty in obtaining their concurrence to any modifications of the treaty which might be suggested. But although I have not thought it right to point out in the Resolution what modifications should be introduced into the treaty, because upon constitutional grounds I think it beyond the province of Parliament to prescribe them, yet I do not think there is any impropriety in my stating what are my own views upon that point. I will therefore express my conviction that if we wish to remain on good terms with Japan, that it is in the first place indispensable greatly to restrict the operation of what is called the "extritoriality" clause. At present British subjects in certain ports of Japan, and for a considerable distance beyond them, are altogether exempted from the control of the Native authorities. I will venture to say that such a system could not possibly be worked in Europe. If English sailors at Havre or New York, or American and French sailors in Liverpool, were exempt from the interference of the local police, and if they could only be dealt with by their own Consuls, it would be impossible for a single day to maintain order and peace in these towns. It is exactly the same in China and Japan, where we have no machinery to control our own subjects. Indeed, without taking the government of those countries into our own hands, it would be impossible to have an efficient police or proper tribunals for the maintenance of order or the administration of justice. If, therefore, it should be thought necessary to adhere to the principle of "extritoriality" at all, and I am by no means sure that we ought, for I am far from being convinced that a substitute for that system might not be provided with the assent of the Japanese Government, which would ensure to foreigners all necessary protection without the present abuses—if, I say, that principle is to be maintained at all, it ought to be confined within the narrowest limits possible, and the privilege should be enjoyed within a very restricted space set apart in the different open ports for the residence of foreigners and for carrying on their trade. I do not mean to say that British subjects should be prevented from going beyond the ports. There would be no occasion for prohibiting of foreigners from going, or even from residing beyond the defined limits, provided it were distinctly understood that if they thought proper to do so it would be at their own risk, that they would be amenable for any misconduct to the Native authorities, and must look also to these alone for protection from violence or wrong without having a claim to call upon the British Minister or Admiral to relieve them from any danger or difficulty. No doubt a great clamour would be raised against such a restriction of the privileges now enjoyed by foreigners in Japan, but with this restriction all that is really necessary for trade, and surely it is not expedient that we should risk all the calamities of war in order that a few merchants and some drunken sailors should be allowed to seek for amusement, without control, for thirty miles round the trading ports. And under this system men who would really act with prudence and consideration for the feelings and customs of the people would have no difficulty in safely visiting the interior, as we may infer from the kind treatment met with by Mr. Fortune and Mr. Veitch. The evils which must necessarily spring from the absence of police have not yet been developed in Japan. To judge of their extent, we should look to China. I have a trade report from Shanghai, which describes the population as in a state of utter lawlessness; and the evils of such a state of things are greatly increased by the mutual jealousies of the Consuls of the Foreign Powers. The English Consul cannot punish an American subject, nor the American Consul an English subject; and the result is that utter lawlessness prevails among the population. I especially complain that vessels are allowed to hoist the British flag on the coast of China, under cover of which they commit depredations which bring odium on this country. Strict measures should be taken to prevent the growth of a similar system on the coasts of Japan.

My Lords, this is the main alteration which is required in the treaty, but I think it would further be advisable to simplify a good deal the stipulations we have imposed upon Japan with respect to trade; and there are some other points on which I should have wished to touch, were it not that I am ashamed of having so long occupied your Lordships' attention. I will, therefore, only state generally what appears to me to be a wise policy to pursue. In the first place, we ought to restrict as much as possible the engagements we impose on Japan, and we should reduce and simplify as much as we can the stipulations of our treaties, in order that the Government of that country might not be tempted to break them, and thus impose on us the necessity of applying coercion. Then I contend that it is on every account in the highest degree desirable that we should be able to reduce the very large force we have in China and Japan. It appears from the papers produced that it has been found necessary to order 1,000 additional men to China, partly with a view to the demands it may be necessary to make on the force in China for service in Japan. And in addition to the land forces, I find, on reference to the naval papers, that we have at this moment in Japan or China no fewer than thirty-five vessels of war—all steamers, including gunboats. This is a very large force, kept up at great expense to the country, and on the principle of my noble Friend we ought to reduce these demands on our resources as much as possible. This is advisable also for another reason—the maintenance of so large a force kept up the feeling of suspicion in the minds of the Japanese. The Bishop of Victoria has stated that the people are quite aware of the origin and history of our connection with India. They know we went there as traders, and ended by subduing all the Native Princes and Powers of India. They are very much afraid of the same fate themselves, and most anxious to maintain their independence. It appears to me that a really profitable trade between the two nations can never be carried on unless goodwill and friendship be established. It is in vain to go on as we are now doing. So long as their object is to thwart or cripple our trade, they will always find out some new means of accomplishing it, apparently within the letter of the treaty. But if we go on the opposite principle—if we make them feel the value of our trade—if we endeavour to remove their just suspicions and just fears as to the consequences of what is now going on—if we do that, the commerce is so mutually advantageous that we may rely on it the people and Government of Japan will learn to see its benefits, and gradually relax their restrictions upon it. I have it upon the authority of my noble Friend himself (Earl Russell) that it was the misconduct of British subjects, their overbearing and lawless behaviour, which has been the source of all these evils. It is the knowledge that they are backed by the force of this country which leads them to adopt such a line of conduct, and nothing would have so good an effect in inducing them to alter their behaviour as the withdrawal or diminution of the force at their command. I may remind my noble Friend how well this policy succeeded in China during his own administration. Almost immediately after my noble Friend formed his Administration (in which I had the honour of holding the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies), in July, 1846, the Government received intelligence of an expedition which had been sent without instructions from the Government at home by the Governor of Hong Kong to destroy the forts in the Canton river in order to punish the Chinese for certain offences which they were said to have committed. With the full assent of my noble Friend and the Cabinet, I addressed to the Governor of Hong Kong a despatch containing a severe reproof for this unauthorized exercise of power; and, in order to prevent the possibility of such an attempt being repeated, followed it up by greatly reducing the strength of the garrison of Hong Kong. That had the very best effect in producing a conciliatory disposition on the part of the British authorities, and for six years there was no quarrel between them and the Chinese. No sooner, however, was the Crimean war at an end than an additional force was sent to Hong Kong; and in a very short time the Governor picked a quarrel with the Chinese, which led to a war, all the ill consequences of which have not yet been fully experienced.

My Lords, my last Resolution proposes that a humble Address should be presented to Her Majesty setting forth the substance of the preceding ones. I must express my earnest hope that my noble Friend will not regard this as a censure upon the policy of the Government. Although I recommend a change of policy, I do not consider this to imply blame of those who are now in office, because the responsibility for the policy hitherto pursued does not rest entirely with Her Majesty's present Government. It rests in part, at least, with their predecessors, and still more with Parliament, which has tacitly approved that policy. I ask the House to pronounce no censure; I only ask it to express an opinion that our experience of the working of the treaty concluded six years ago with Japan has shown that it is desirable that that treaty should be revised and its terms amended. If Her Majesty's Government are inclined to take that course, it is most desirable that they should have the declared support of Parliament, because it cannot be done without provoking some clamour out of doors. I trust that your Lordships will agree to the Resolutions which I am about to move. I have asked for your support only upon the ground that our commercial interests render desirable the course which I am recommending; but I am persuaded that your Lordships will agree with me that this question involves far higher considerations than that, and that we are bound to consider not only what is for our interest, but what is consistent with our notions of right and wrong. Even if it can be proved—which it cannot—that it is necessary to adhere in Japan to a system by which we should inevitably become involved in a war with the Japanese, we should be bound to abstain from taking a course so contrary to the plainest rules of justice and right.

The noble Earl then moved to resolve,

1. That the Relations between this Country and Japan appear to this House to be at present in a highly unsatisfactory State :

2. That it is shown by the Papers laid before Parliament by Command of Her Majesty, that the Treaty concluded between Her Majesty and the Tycoon of Japan on the 26th of August, 1858, gives to British Subjects in Japan Rights and Privileges which the Government of that Country was avowedly reluctant to grant, and was only induced to confer upon them through Dread of British Naval and Military Power :

3. That the Government of Japan has also been induced by this same Fear to make with other European Nations and with the United States Treaties generally similar to that which it has concluded with Her Majesty :

4. That under the above-named Treaty British Subjects are entitled to claim Admission into certain Portions of the Territory of Japan without being subject to the Jurisdiction of its Government, Her Majesty having taken upon herself the Obligation of enforcing on their Part good Conduct and Obedience to the Law :

5. That the Reports of Her Majesty's diplomatic Servants show that Her Majesty has not been able to fulfil this Obligation : the Provisions of the Statutes authorizing Her Majesty's Consuls to try and punish British Subjects for Offences committed in Japan, and the Means available for carrying these Laws into effect, have proved altogether insufficient to prevent gross Outrages and Insults from being inflicted on the People of Japan by British Subjects and Persons assuming that Character :

6. That the Animosity against Foreigners excited in the Minds of the Japanese by these

Outrages and Insults has increased the Repugnance long felt by the most powerful Classes among them to renewed Intercourse with European Nations, and has led to the Perpetration of some Murders and several daring and desperate Attacks upon Foreigners ; diplomatic Servants and other Subjects of Her Majesty having been among the Sufferers from these Acts of Violence :

7. That the Government of the Tycoon has professed the strongest Desire to prevent the Commission of these Crimes and to punish their Perpetrators, but has declared itself unable to do so ; nor does there appear to be any Reason to doubt the Truth of these Declarations, since Two Tycoons and a Regent of Japan have themselves been murdered, and One of the principal Ministers narrowly escaped the same Fate, owing to the Hostility they had incurred from being supposed to favour an increased Intercourse with Foreigners :

8. That in order to enforce a Demand made by Her Majesty's Government of Redress for the Murder of a British Subject it was found necessary to undertake hostile Operations against One of the Daimios, in the Course of which considerable Loss was experienced by Her Majesty's Ships and a large and flourishing Japanese Town was burnt to the Ground :

9. That this Experience of what has already taken place leaves little Hope for the future of its being possible to avert fresh Collisions between Her Majesty's Subjects and the Japanese if the existing Arrangements for regulating the Intercourse between them are maintained unaltered ; and if such Collisions should occur they must sooner or later lead to a War which would necessarily cost many Lives and much Money both to this Country and to Japan, and would probably bring upon the latter the heavy Calamities of general Anarchy and Confusion from the Destruction of its existing Government, while there would be no Means of creating any other Authority to replace it :

10. That, apart from all higher Considerations, the true Interests of this Country, and especially its permanent Commercial Interests, require that such calamitous Results should not be risked by maintaining the existing Treaty with Japan unaltered, and that it is desirable that the Provisions of this Treaty should be so modified as to place the future Intercourse of the Two Nations on a better Footing for the future :

11. That it would therefore be advisable that Her Majesty's Servants should without Delay enter into friendly Communication with the Government of Japan and with the Governments of other Nations having Treaties with Japan similar to our own, for the Purpose of determining what Changes it would be expedient to make in the Provisions of these Treaties :

12. That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to lay before Her Majesty the Substance of the foregoing Resolutions, and humbly to pray that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to take the same into Her serious Consideration, with the view of adopting such Measures as may be found best calculated to avert War between this Country and Japan, and to promote an Increase of Trade and friendly Intercourse between the Two Nations to their mutual Advantage.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, after the long and able speech which my noble Friend has made, I am, I confess, somewhat disappointed to find that he should have sat down without having thrown any light on what I thought was the main purpose of my noble Friend in addressing you—our relations with Japan might be amended. He thinks it desirable that there should be an increase of trade between the two nations, and I had hoped he was about to point out the means whereby this object might be obtained: but although he was profuse in his censures on the existing state of things, yet as to the manner in which that intercourse might be improved my noble Friend was very nearly silent. My noble Friend began his speech by finding fault with the manner in which our intercourse with Japan was begun. And here I must remark that, both on this subject and on the subject of what our policy should be, he aimed at subverting our policy, not only in that country but in China, and with regard to all Eastern nations. My noble Friend says that our treaty with Japan was obtained by force and intimidation. In the case of China, no doubt the treaty of Tien-tsin was brought about by our entering the Peiho with a considerable force; but my noble Friend is hardly correct in the assertion which he made in reference to Japan. Lord Elgin went to Japan with one steam frigate and, I believe, two gunboats, which is hardly such a force as could be fairly said to have so intimidated the Japanese Government and to have forced the treaty upon them. There were, I may add, other treaties made before that time. There was one entered into between Japan and America on the occasion when Commodore Perry went to that country with a considerable force; and I cannot see that Lord Elgin was so much to blame because he went with a frigate and two gunboats to make a similar treaty. Other nations, says my noble Friend, have followed the same policy of intimidation. Now, one of those Powers which have intimidated Japan is Switzerland, which my noble Friend will, I think, hardly contend is a Power calculated to inspire the Japanese with such fear as to force them to conclude a treaty of commerce. That being so, the foundation of my noble Friend's argument falls to the ground, for it appears that it was not by intimidation that we obtained the treaty, and that, even if it was obtained by force on our part, greater force had been employed on the part of other countries. But what, let me ask, have been the fruits of these treaties? One would have thought that if the origin of these treaties had been so objectionable, as my noble Friend describes, the fruits of the treaties would have been of a kind equally undesirable; but the results have been that, in the course of a few years, there is a commercial intercourse of foreign nations with Japan to the value of £7,000,000. What, let me ask, is that but the intercourse of friendship—an intercourse whereby the Japanese obtain what they want from foreigners, and foreigners what they want from them, to the mutual benefit of both. Is that the friendly intercourse which my noble Friend wishes to stop? Why, he declares himself that he wishes to increase the trade with Japan. But then, he says that the Japanese having been induced to make the treaty through fear, we entered into a stipulation that British subjects should be entitled to obtain admission to certain portions of the territory of Japan without being under the jurisdiction of the Japanese authorities, but that they should be amenable for any offences they might commit only to our own authorities. He complains of the law called the "extraterritorial law." But what, I would ask, has been the whole course of our intercourse with Eastern nations? What is the history of our intercourse with China and with Turkey? Have we not entered into arrangements with China of this very character? Would we be justified, then, in adopting an entirely new plan in regard to Japan, saying that the Japanese laws should be allowed to prevail in the case of any British subject who might be accused of having committed an offence against them? Your Lordships must bear in mind that the Japanese laws are most sanguinary. What should we say if we heard in England that a young English merchant had been brought before the Japanese tribunals subjected to torture, put to death, being disembowelled, and, in short, suffering all the horrid tortures which the code of the country inflicts? And what would be said if we were to admit the application of the Japanese law to British offenders, that all the relations of the criminal should be put to death for his offence? Is it desirable, under those circumstances, that we should abandon a plan which has now been acted upon for three centuries, in accordance with which, when we enter Oriental nations, we carry with us our own tribunals and our own notions of justice? When Japanese subjects commit an offence against the English we ask them to punish their own criminals; but when an Englishman commits an offence we do not surrender him up to be dealt with by the Japanese laws. In that respect we can, I think, make no alteration without incurring great danger; and I believe that the very danger which my noble Friend pointed out—that of getting into repeated disputes with the Chinese and Japanese authorities—would be promoted and not prevented by our taking the position which my noble Friend suggested in reference to our merchants in those parts. I cannot say, therefore, that in this respect the suggestion of my noble Friend would bring about any advantages; whilst, however, fully convinced of the advantages arising from our trade with China and Japan, I am obliged to admit with sorrow that that trade is undoubtedly accompanied by great abuses on the part of Englishmen themselves. Their manner and demeanour when living in those Eastern countries is not always what it ought to be. I this very morning received a letter from Sir Frederick Bruce, written in the same admirable tone and temper as so many others, in which he laments the insolence and disregard of Chinese customs, the want of courtesy, and the improper behaviour in many respects towards an inferior race, which characterizes some of our countrymen, and which he says is a disgrace to several who go apparently for the purposes of trade to China. The same thing, I am sorry to think, may be said in the case of Japan; nor is it confined to these two among Eastern nations. I hope that in time to come these persons will be influenced by more civilized views, and more regard to the customs of the persons among whom they live. All that we can under the circumstances do is that which men like Sir Rutherford Alcock are disposed to do—that is, to refuse to take up the cause of any of these men who may bring trouble on themselves by their own misconduct, and thus show them that it is not because they belong to a powerful nation that they are to be countenanced in their misconduct. I know of no alteration in the treaty, of no particular provisions which could be introduced, which could remedy the present state of things; and we can only hope that while the commercial intercourse itself with Japan is productive of great benefit, the abuses which attend upon it will be in time removed by the exhibition of better conduct on the part of our own countrymen, who have the remedy entirely in their own hands. I would add that the Government of the Tycoon has shown every disposition—being fairly treated on our part—to do all that is necessary on their side to improve the trade between the two countries. But it is not attributable to our policy that there are great dissensions in Japan. There are the Prince of Satsuma, the Prince of Nagato, and many others of the high feudal aristocracy—one of them said to have 200,000 men under his command, and immense revenues—whose privileges and feudal powers were secured to them some two or three centuries ago. There is, besides, the Mikado, a sort of supreme spiritual chief, and there is the Tycoon, who is said by the best authorities to have the treaty-making power. How can we prevent these different authorities from quarrelling among themselves and from being jealous of one another? The Daimios say, and perhaps with truth, that the Tycoon has managed in providing that certain ports shall be the ports at which English ships shall enter, to take the greater part of the profits to himself, and to prevent the ports which belong to these Daimios from being the places of commerce for foreign merchants. If that be so, as it is well known that the profits of this trade are enormous, it is no wonder that these Daimios wish to have some share in it, and that many of them wish, in conjunction with the Mikado, to overpower the authority of the Tycoon. But that is not a matter with which the English are concerned; that is not a result for which British power is responsible. It is a matter that may at any time produce civil war—civil war not brought about by England, but by the dissensions and jealousies of the Japanese themselves. A noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) who brought forward the question of Japan last year, concluded—as, sitting in Opposition, it was perhaps natural for him to conclude—that we were about to do everything that was foolish upon this subject—he said that the Government were going to punish the Tycoon, as the Tycoon was our friend, and that the Daimio, who was our enemy, we intended to leave alone. Now, the fact is that we were quite as wise as the noble Earl opposite. We did say, no doubt, that the Tycoon ought to pay a considerable fine because he had allowed a public road to be the scene of a disgraceful murder on the part of one of the Daimios ; but we called upon the Daimio himself to bring the murderers to justice, and pay his share of the fine. We did not, therefore, commit the folly that the noble Earl supposed we should commit. My noble Friend who brought forward this question to-night meant, it seems, to be particularly civil; but he told us that our conduct with respect to the murder of Mr. Richardson was against all principles of international law, against all principles of justice, and against good policy. For a particularly civil person, this, I think, was rather hard upon the Government. But I do not see the matter in that light. Here were three or four English people—one of them a lady—riding upon a road which was assigned by treaty as a road upon which British subjects were able to pass on foot or on horseback when they pleased. Being there when one of these great Daimios passed, they stood on one side of the road, where one of them was murdered, the lady and the others being attacked, and escaping with many bruises and wounds to Yokohama. We thought that was an injury which required some reparation, and we did not think it was contrary to the law of nations to ask for reparation. We said that the murderers ought to be tried; and as the Prince of Satsuma refused any redress, we sent ships to his harbour and took by way of reprisals two of his vessels. The Prince of Satsuma, I must say, behaved in one respect with great humanity, for he sent a notice to his own people that there would probably be some firing, and advised them to leave the town. The batteries of this town fired upon our men-of-war. What were our men-of-war to do? Were they not to return the fire? Were they to go off immediately as fast as they could without returning the fire, and with all the appearance, and, indeed, the reality, of running away from the forces of the Daimio? What would have been the consequence of such conduct? Why, my Lords, how unsafe would have been the life of every Englishman in Japan! The Admiral who was in command of the British squadron ordered fire to be opened. It was opened against those batteries; the batteries were in a great degree silenced; but as a high wind was blowing at the time, and the houses were entirely built of wood and paper, the town caught fire and a great part of it was burnt. Well, I think, though this was a lamentable occurrence, that a great deal too much horror was expressed at it. In consequence of the notice that had been given hardly any persons were killed except the soldiers in the batteries; there really was not that great mortality which has been so much lamented; the town has been since rebuilt, and people say that it is a handsomer town than it ever was before. I cannot believe, then, that that proceeding was of the character which my noble Friend states; and certainly with regard to the followers of Prince Satsuma, it was a good lesson for them, for they owned that they did not know that the English were so strong; that they should beware how they offended them again; and the Prince of Satsuma himself has shown since that time the most friendly disposition towards us. My noble Friend says that these collisions must lead to war. But is it more likely that war will result by inflicting some punishment upon the murderers of our people, or by allowing those murderers to go unpunished until there shall be a large accumulation of murders and other injuries? My belief is that the taking notice in this way of such an injury as a horrible murder is the way not to lead to future collisions and war, but rather to prevent them. We know very well what has happened with regard to the French. One of the Japanese princes, the Prince Nagato, as a French ship was passing through a narrow strait, fired upon it and inflicted considerable injury. The French Admiral thereupon attacked the battery, the Japanese soldiers ran away, the battery was destroyed, and every gun was made useless for the future. Here, then, according to my noble Friend, would have been the origin of a great war between France and Japan. But Japan thought better of it, and sent an Embassy to beg pardon for the outrage, and a new treaty has been made between the French and Japanese Government. Such was the effect of an order very similar to that for which I am so much blamed in the case of the Prince of Satsuma. I quite agree with my noble Friend that these Japanese are most ingenious people. This Prince of Satsuma himself has more than once been on board our steam-vessels, and has been very curious in making inquiries, and has bought several steam-vessels himself; and I am told—by Colonel Neale I think—that the Japanese would buy a foreign steam-vessel in a port, and that, the European crew being out of it, they would put their own crew on board and steam out of the port at once, with complete command of the machinery, as if they had been taught the use of it from their earliest youth. Nay, more—in another case one of our officers was receiving two Japanese officers of rank, and immediately they came on board they began discussing the merits of the Armstrong and Whitworth guns, showing great knowledge of all the mechanism of those guns. I am in hopes that, so far from leading to the stoppage of further intercourse between us, so far from leading to hostilities, the policy of Her Majesty's Government will lead to the maintenance of friendly relations with the Japanese; that their display of the more than ordinary anxiety found among Eastern nations to profit by European intercourse will establish that intercourse on a footing of mutual advantage; and that, though there may be on the part of some of the Japanese a good deal of murmuring like the rumbling of distant thunder, the advantage of commercial relations between the two countries will gradually be seen in Japan, and will gradually insure a friendly and a peaceful intercommunication. Coming to the last Resolution of my noble Friend, I must say I had expected from him information and instruction as to the way in which we should improve our relations with Japan. Had he pointed out any mode by which we could effect that object, Her Majesty's Government would have gladly availed themselves of my noble Friend's suggestions. But when he came to that part of his speech, after he had thought fit to blame every part of the policy of the Government of this country—not only of the present, but of former Governments—he said it belonged to Her Majesty's Government to find out the way in which an improvement could be effected. Now, my Lords, I must say I so far agree with this Resolution as to see much difficulty in the present state of affairs; but I think if we were to say to the Japanese that we should modify our treaty—that we were prepared to make new arrangements—I think the effect would be that which such a course would have upon other Eastern nations—we should only inspire the Japanese with the idea that we were afraid of their hostilities, and that we were ready to conciliate them by needless and unworthy concessions. I do not see, therefore, that we should gain by any measures of that sort. I am not at all reluctant to enter into some friendly relations with the Japanese, though I must remind your Lordships that friendly relations have been going on between the Government in this country and the Government in Japan, and also between our Minister in Japan and the Ministers of the Tycoon. Sir Rutherford Alcock was prepared to do everything that was courteous towards the Tycoon, and he showed himself ready to do anything which our laws enabled him to do in order to punish any young Englishman who went beyond the rights to which British subjects were entitled according to the terms of our treaty. My noble Friend has said that I have lately spoken as if this country was perfectly helpless. I am quite aware that this country can do great hurt to other countries; but I do not let out of sight that other countries may do some hurt to us. I own that I contemplate not only with repugnance, but disgust, such a state of things as boasting of nothing but the injury which we could do to other countries, while they, on the other hand, should be boasting of the injury which they could do to us. Certainly that is not a pleasant subject of contemplation; but we know we have power—all foreign nations know we have by our naval and military forces power—to inflict great hurt on any nation attacking us. My noble Friend says, that as regards this country and Japan, we are not behaving according to the laws of nations. I am afraid that for a very long time to come it will be necessary to keep a considerable naval force in the seas of Japan. There are, as I have said, various parties in Japan, and one of them is very likely to say they will not permit foreigners to come there any longer, and that they will drive them from Japan. That, no doubt, might lead to scenes of bloodshed; but I cannot see that we ought to retire from Japan for that reason, or forego those rights which are of great benefit to us and at the same time of great benefit to the Japanese. My belief is, that we should endeavour to behave justly, and on every occasion repair any wrong of which the Japanese may have reason to complain, but at the same time seek redress for any wrong which may be done by them to British subjects. Under existing circumstances, that is all I can say, while, of course, I should be glad that our relations with Japan could be closer and more secure. But we must recollect that this is a new commerce. The treaty only dates from, I think, 1858, and there is much to be smoothed away in regard to our relations with a people who for a long time would not admit foreigners into their country. At the same time, the commerce between the two nations has been in many respects rapid. During the first four years after the Treaty of Nankin our imports of silk from China amounted to 20,000 bales; in the first four years after our treaty with Japan our imports of silk from that country have been 25,000 bales. That shows a considerable willingness on the part of the Japanese to enter into commerce, and to establish those relations with us which may tend to the promotion of trade. It is impossible for us who have such commerce in every part of the world not to see that in Japan, as elsewhere, some misunderstanding may arise; and all the British Government can do is not to modify or alter those treaties which we have with the Japanese—not to say we will give further concessions in addition to those which we have already made. Last year we engaged to put off the opening of two ports, which were to have been opened this year, for seven years more, and we have shown every disposition to agree to any concession which the Japanese could reasonably ask for; but it appears to me that it would be more advantageous for all parties to go on steadily and quietly, but maintaining our rights, rather than to inaugurate a new system and policy, more especially if that new system and policy were in contradiction of all we have ever done in our dealings with Eastern nations from the time when we first had intercourse with them.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD: My Lords, I feel bound to express my thanks to the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) for having brought this subject before your Lordships and the country as he has done. I watched closely the speech of the noble Earl, and have carefully considered his Resolutions, and it does appear to me that so far as possible he has avoided all unnecessary blame for the past, and has rather directed the attention of your Lordships to the future and its dangers, and the mode in which those dangers might be averted, than indulged in anything like recrimination in regard to events which have already taken place. I waited with great anxiety to hear the answer given by the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, confident that everything that could be said on the other side would be said with that terse and telling eloquence which the noble Earl always uses. I confess I have listened with great disappointment to that answer. So far as it concerns the removing from my mind the apprehension which the speech of the noble Earl (Earl Grey) had excited, I think the answers to the special points made by my noble Friend were not conclusive. The first and main answer, as I understand it, of the noble Earl to the objections taken by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) to the system by which we undertook on our part to exercise our own laws against our own people in that distant country, and to leave the Japanese to exercise their laws against their own people, is that such is the universal custom of this country with regard to Eastern nations, and that the noble Earl who introduced this subject wished to sweep that entirely away. The noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office then drew a picture of what would be the result if that arrangement was departed from and the Japanese left to execute their laws on our countrymen. But, my Lords, I distinctly understood the noble Earl (Earl Grey) proposed to guard against any such supposition. I understood him to say that at the principal ports and at the factories where we had our goods—at those places where we were able to enforce on our own people the reasonable obedience to the Japanese laws, that there he would maintain that principle; but that what he complained of was that we undertake what we cannot perform, because we undertake to throw around individual members of this country in all parts of Japan the ægis of the security of a British subject, and thus have led them to ignore in a most reckless manner the laws of Japan; that we have no power of preventing the breach of those laws, and scarcely any power of punishing them. My noble Friend argued—and I have waited to hear the point answered—that these two were correlative obligations; that where we undertake to protect our own people by our own laws we are bound to show we have sufficient power to make the people obey those laws to which by coming into the country they subject themselves, and to punish those who break them. Therefore the answer of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary is not satisfactory. I see no reason why this country should confer that which the Government themselves have admitted tends to make our people act in a way that will provoke hostility—the power of recklessly asserting their supposed British independence—which is so dangerous an element in the character of our people. Then the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary said that he broadly denied that the treaties with Japan were chiefly brought about by intimidation, and he quoted Sir Rutherford Alcock in support of that position. But, if there is any point on which Sir Rutherford Alcock is more explicit and emphatic than another it is his declaration that these treaties were brought about by intimidation. He says the Americans went there, and appealed to what we were doing in China, alarming the minds of the Japanese by asking them whether they would bring all this upon themselves, they being unprepared. Then came the news of our successes in China, and the appearance of a small flotilla, which the Japanese took for the avant courier of a great fleet, and the treaties they entered into were distinctly in fear of this country. So strongly did Sir Rutherford Alcock feel this, that he says—

“I know it is alleged that there is a party in the country who are in favour of progress and who desire to see the foreigner admitted into the country to trade, but I have never been able to find that it exists.”

There are, he says, there, as everywhere else, two parties—one more extravagantly attached than the other to what they consider their own national habits. And he described them as being known in Japan as the toad-in-the-well party and the non toad-in-the-well party; but he says that the most liberal he had been able to find were hostile to doing away with restrictions against foreigners coming amongst them, and that feeling has increased everywhere. He says that whereas at first foreigners on going there were received in the houses of the poor with something of welcome and hospitality; but he adds, “I dare not say they would meet anywhere with such a welcome now.” Therefore that which originally began in intimidation is continued now, according to Sir Rutherford Alcock’s statement, under increasing disgust, only repressed through the terror of our violence. And, again, we were told by the noble Earl (the Foreign Secretary) that the burning of the Prince of Satsuma’s town had been productive of good, and had led him to behave courteously and well since. When we know that he, in common with the other Daimios, is concerting a plan by which they hope, as they believe, to deliver their country—when we know that they are purchasing rifled cannon, and making every provision for that blow which they hope to strike—can we not see that the treaties have been granted with reluctance, that they have been extorted by violence, and that this is the preparation for the certain vengeance which is so much more a characteristic of the Japanese than concession? This is really the strength of the statement of my noble Friend (Earl Grey). The perpetual complaint of the more thoughtful Japanese has been that we are hurrying things too fast. “We grant,” they say, “that it may be well, as you tell us, that we should become a trading community, that we should increase our wealth by dealing with the nations of the West; but there must be time for such a trade to grow up. At present it is but an injury to us; at every turn you take our vegetable wax, and you do not leave enough for our own people; you have tricked us as to our gold and exported it in masses, though we have treaty obligations to the contrary; you have suffered your people to insult us and you have set up a shadow man to evade the stipulations of our treaty. All this you have done because you will barter to a degree which we as a people cannot bear the introduction of your commerce and your merchandise. Give us time;”—that is a note sounded in their representation that must reach every heart. What they in reality say is, “If you are to be enriched by this sudden traffic, have you no regard for us? Can you not feel for our sufferings? Is it just to force this upon us that you may a little sooner acquire so much more wealth?” My noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs did not attempt to answer, and I think he did not because he felt he could not answer it, the allegation of the exceeding danger we are running of absolutely destroying the internal Government of Japan by the course we are now taking. Can it be the intention of this country to reduce Japan to the miserable state of an utterly ungoverned anarchy? Yet that must be the effect if you shake the existing power and cannot substitute another. All the injuries that have been brought upon China must come upon Japan, and many of them with tenfold severity, if you succeed in your policy. We have heard to-night of the great jealousies between the different parties in the Government of Japan. I believe, as far as there exists any difference between the Tycoon and Mikado it could be easily removed; but there is a fierce feud amongst the Daimios, and a continuous tendency to resist the power of the Tycoon, when the Tycoon seems to commit the country to what they consider steps fatal to its welfare. It is said that every step of these treaties has been written in the blood of successive Tycoons. Not one of the treaties has been executed that has not been followed by the poisoning or assassination of the Minister who signed it, and the banishment and degradation of all his subordinates. Does this show that the treaties have been gladly entered into by the Japanese? Does it not tend at once to prove that the treaties were forced upon them by acts of intimidation? What must be the result of continuing such measures? First, the breaking down of the wealth and power of the only central controlling authority which tends to keep these different feudal chieftains in any measure of order. Then, to national dissension among themselves and the misery of the whole Native population. And in the midst of that what attitude are we to assume? Are we to occupy the country, to administer its revenues, to administer its justice, to reform its laws — in short, to make it a part or dependency of our own country, or are we to leave it in the midst of its anarchy? What is to become of your trade if you leave it in a state of anarchy? And how, if you took the other course, are you to have a force sufficient in that remote country to operate amidst a hostile people united against you, with every advantage by nature for repelling invasion? How are you to make head against them except at a cost which I believe the people of Great Britain will not knowingly incur, in order that they may a little hasten the growth of commerce in Japan? It is on these points that the speech of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey), which I think exhausted the subject, remains unanswered; and I feel with him, that having passed through all these considerations, which I may call considerations of expediency, we come to the still stronger grounds of the natural principles of right. I maintain that we have no right, no authority, in the sight of Him who governs the universe, to force on an independent people by arms a treaty of commerce which they refuse. I maintain that having established that commerce, we have no right whatever to undertake engagements as to our own subjects which we cannot fulfil, and that the treaty, as it is now constructed, does lead this country to undertake to make its subjects do that which it has no power to make them do. The natural instincts of a people stand ready to avenge themselves when they find we cannot make our subjects obey the laws which they were bound to obey and we have undertaken to enforce. When reading Sir Rutherford Alcock's letter and book I found the greatest efforts were made by the authorities to induce our people to abstain for three days from making use of a certain road where the Daimios were passing, it being contrary to their law that foreigners should meet them. Although every other road was open for the pleasure of our people they refused to comply with the request of the authorities, although the use of that road was not necessary either for business or pleasure. We have no right to undertake for these people what we have not the power to exact; and I, for one, believe that introducing into the commerce of this country such doubtful and, I may say, such unjust principles, is the way not to its final extension, but is the surest way to lead to its ruin. There is an eating canker upon every extension of national prosperity that is founded on injustice, which by a law more certain than the returns of any mercantile adventure, avenges the cause of right and justice upon the people by whom those principles have been violated. It is written, and will be fulfilled—"Woe unto him that buildeth his chamber on unrighteousness and his house upon wrong."

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he did not think it was necessary to go back to the origin of the treaty with Japan; but he would remind their Lordships that a treaty was obtained in the first instance by the American Government, and all that we and other nations asked was to be put on the same footing as the Americans. He entirely concurred with the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) as to the importance of our showing forbearance and moderation in our dealings with the Japanese, and in regretting the misconduct of many Europeans in that country. No doubt there had been many cases of gross tyranny perpetrated towards the Natives of Japan, not by Englishmen only but by other Europeans; but that was a question quite apart from the treaty. The noble Earl said they should make a new treaty with Japan; but whilst he said that, his Resolutions affirmed that we on the one side and the Tycoon on the other could not enforce the present one. Then of what use would it be our entering into fresh negotiations with them for another treaty? His (the Duke of Somerset's) main objection to the Resolutions was that, if adopted, they would inevitably lead to war; for if we were to depart from our present treaty rights the Japanese would say we had given them a great advantage—that they had obtained a great victory, and that all they had to do was to insist on further concessions. The objection raised by the British and French Admirals to the erection of the batteries at Yokohama was, he thought, very well founded, for those batteries would, as they stated, have placed the lives and the property of foreigners there at the mercy of the Japanese. The House would remember that when Admiral Hope went to the Peiho, batteries were insidiously raised, and his ships being allowed to come in quite close were then suddenly fired into. If we had allowed these batteries to be erected at Yokohama the Europeans would have been in a similar manner entirely at the mercy of the Japanese, and the English and French Admirals felt it their duty to resist their construction. The noble Earl said that Her Majesty's Government protected British subjects wherever they went in Japan. That was not the case. It was an entire mistake. What Her Majesty's Government did was to protect them at Yokohama, and along a road which by treaty they had a right to use.

EARL GREY: For twenty-five miles.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: Yes. He had seen a great many persons who had returned from Japan, and they complained that they were kept just to one spot, and that they could only go up and down that one road to get a little exercise. The noble Earl had said that foreigners could go into the interior quietly for the purpose of studying botany; but that was not the case. He sent a gentleman there for that purpose, and when he got to Yokohama he was willing to submit to anything for the love of science; but he was sent back, and the Japanese authorities would not let him go anywhere. The noble Earl also said that the Daimios had a great objection to trade, and looked upon traders with contempt; but there also he was totally wrong. The noble Earl's speech was full of errors from the beginning to the end. The fact was Satsuma was jealous. He did not object to trade, but said the Tycoon was getting all the profit out of the trade, and that he ought to share in it. Here was this preud Daimio, who could not bear trade, longing to share in the profits of it. The noble Earl asked, by his tenth Resolution, that the provisions of the treaty might be so modified as "to place the future intercourse of the two nations on a better footing." But how were Her Majesty's Government to do that when they could not obtain the rights secured to them by the treaty already in existence? In his opinion the best way would be to keep the treaty already made, and by firmness on the one hand and forbearance on the other, its provisions might be fairly carried out. We had certain rights by the treaty in Japan, and the Japanese knew it, and admitted it. Satsuma's people admitted that we had a right to inflict punishment for the murder, and that they were liable for it; and so far from the burning of their town having had an ill effect, it had had a most excellent effect, and when the people came back they were ready to enter into another treaty. As for the burning of the town, the Japanese attached little importance to this loss as it could be rebuilt in a few days. He saw a gentleman a short time ago who came from Yokohama, who informed him that whilst at Yokohama he saw a large establishment used for the education of young Japanese ladies burnt down on the Monday, and to his surprise it was all built up again on the Friday following. That was a specimen of how rapidly these paper and wooden houses were burnt down and rebuilt. He confessed he was sorry to hear the attacks that had been made upon Admiral Kuper, and he felt certain that however much they might wish to complain of the Government, they ought not to blame an officer who had strictly performed his duty. When Admiral Kuper heard of the attacks that were made upon him in Parliament he forwarded to him a letter, in which he expressed his great regret that such attacks should have been made upon him in his absence. He stated that at the time he deeply regretted that in firing on the batteries he should have destroyed the town, adding, that when he forwarded his despatch to the Government he certainly did not refer to that regret so much as he ought, because two of his officers were killed by his side on the bridge of the steamer, and he wrote the despatch in a hurry immediately after. He, however, did express his regret, and he had frequently since done so, for the sufferings of the Japanese. They were an industrious and amiable people, and if they could be separated from some of the Daimios who were hostile to all foreigners, they would be very fond of trade, for he had been informed by letter that many of the Daimios put the people to death because they traded with Europeans; and notwithstanding the danger they ran they would continually bring down their goods and silks in order to trade with the foreigners; which, so far from showing that they hated trade, proved that they were fond of it. He (the Duke of Somerset) had thought it his duty to justify Admiral Kuper's conduct from the attacks that had been made upon it, feeling that he had only been actuated by a strict regard to his duty, which had compelled him to fire upon the batteries. The noble Earl objected to his firing on the batteries, and thought he should have run away. [EARL GREY: No, no!] When the Japanese fired on our ships, was our Admiral to return it or not? Was he to run away? Nothing was so injurious as not to deal effectually with these people, and the French had just had a difficulty with the Japanese in consequence of one of their ships having fired upon them. The fact was it was very difficult to deal with the Japanese. We knew but little of their habits and prejudices, and it was not very easy to go on with them amicably. We must have occasional outbreaks and misfortunes of this kind with the Japanese unless we were prepared to leave the country. But how could that be done? The Americans, the French, the Russians, the Prussians, the Swedes, the Dutch, and, in fact, all the European nations, were trading under the same treaty rights, and were we to run all round Europe, and ask the different nations to give up their treaty rights also? Certainly not. It could not be done. If we withdrew from Japan we should leave all the other nations there, and instead of having a hold on Japan we should have none, and they would trade with us under the American flag. Lord Elgin said we required a force in that country as much to keep our own people in order as the Japanese. He believed the best course to pursue was to adhere faithfully to the treaty, and at the same time practise all moderation and forbearance towards the Japanese; and while punishing those who misbehaved themselves, to hold the Japanese Government strictly to the fulfilment of their obligations.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the

noble Earl and also the noble Duke had acted somewhat inconsistently, for they had both of them devoted a considerable portion of their speeches to the affair of Kagosima, which his noble Friend (Earl Grey) had distinctly stated he would not then enter into, as it was a very large question, and had already been discussed this Session by their Lordships. The speeches, however, of the noble Earl and the noble Duke had been devoted to disinterring that old question. He fully admitted the great difficulty in which the Government were placed in dealing with the question of the treaty with Japan. The fact was, that during the last few years the class of traders who had gone out to Japan had been of an inferior order. In former years those who traded with China were persons of respectability and influence, connected with large firms—houses of immense wealth and responsibility; but now most of those who went to China and Japan were small traders—lawless and reckless men, who were allured there simply and solely by the enormous profits that were to be made on those coasts. Those were the men who committed outrages in Japan, and in defiance of treaty obligations established settlements for the purposes of contraband and illicit trade. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) said he lamented these outrages, and asked how they could be prevented. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) submitted that it was the bounden duty of Her Majesty's Government to exercise as far as possible a check and a restraint through the Foreign Office; and to show that he was not speaking at random, he would refer to a recent case of a very atrocious description which had taken place in Japan. An outrage was attempted on the person of a young Japanese girl by an Englishman. He was reprovved at the time for his conduct, but a few months after he was promoted. That was a case for the interference of the Foreign Office, which might have exercised a wholesome restraint by marking its deep sense of the wrong that had been committed. He was afraid that it was not always the foreign traders who were to blame for such conduct, because the papers which had been laid upon the table with regard to China showed that the Consuls themselves, who were really placed there for the purpose of exercising judicial power, and to maintain fair dealing between man and man, very often acted more like partizans than judges, and were frequently guilty of very high-handed and violent conduct. The argument of his noble Friend (Earl Grey) went to that complaint, for he would either place in the hands of the Consuls greater power, or by some local tribunal enable justice to be dealt out alike in all cases. He concurred in all that had fallen from his noble Friend (Earl Grey) on the question of what was called "extra-territoriality," which had already led to great mischiefs in China, and was still going on in that country. The system was mischievous to all concerned. It sapped and undermined the Native authority, and did not establish a complete and satisfactory authority in its stead. Its direct result was the extension of political still more of territorial right, and every morsel of ground annexed involved a fresh body of troops. They were drawing severely on their resources as regards men; and when they calculated their army in India, in the colonies, and in England, he must say he would be a bold man that would say those resources were unlimited and inexhaustible. While acknowledging all the difficulties and abuses that existed in China, and which, indeed, could not be denied, they seemed deliberately involving themselves in precisely the same difficulties in Japan. The state of things was almost identical in the two countries, with this exception, that while in China they had to deal with a nerveless, weak, tame-spirited people, they had in Japan to deal with a military, warlike, and vigorous race, second probably to none in the East except the Sikhs. There was also the same condition of things, the same lawlessness, the same powerlessness of the consuls to restrain outrage, the same difficulty with regard to export and import duties, the same aversion on the part of the Natives to receive us, the same determination on our part to force ourselves upon them by means of treaties extorted from them, which they accepted for the moment, but with the distinct determination to violate their engagements when the first opportunity offered. He remembered reading in one of Sir Frederick Bruce's despatches a statement to this effect, that "the conclusion of a treaty with an Oriental nation was not the termination, but really the beginning of the difficulties with which they had to deal," and that was the precise truth. They had found this in China, and would find it in Japan; and Sir Frederick Bruce went on to say that "even measures of a beneficial and progressive character, extorted by force against the will of the population in such countries, were of very little avail." Well, the noble Earl said matters after all were improved. Kagosima had been burned down, and the noble Earl seemed to make rather merry over it. It was true that Kagosima had been burnt down, and that for the moment there was peace; but he defied any one who had read the papers upon this subject to say that it was more than a temporary breathing space. All through the Correspondence matters went from bad to worse, fresh murders and fresh acts of incendiarism were committed, the very Legation was in a state of siege, with stockades, guards, and camp fires lighted at night; in fact, the state of things was something between peace and war. The noble Earl did him the honour to allude to some observations which he made last year, and said that he spoke, as might have been expected, from a Member of the Opposition. Now, much as he valued party Government, he regarded this question of Japan as much too grave a one to be treated as a party matter. It was one of the most serious questions that could engage the attention of Parliament, and he thought it unfortunate that the country was not thoroughly alive to its importance. But, unfortunately, while our attention was distracted by other matters nearer home, we had little time to devote to matters which were growing up so many thousand miles away in China and Japan affecting our relations with those two countries. The noble Earl complained of his having said that the Government were putting a pressure upon the Tycoon, who was their friend. It was true that he did say that, and he maintained that that was the real state of the case. The only person whom the Government were touching was the only one in the State who was favourable, and who they acknowledged had, so far as he could, dealt fairly with them. He was at variance with a great many of the Daimios, who were continually attempting to subvert his authority; and thus the Government, by the course which they were taking, were playing the game of their enemies. It was perfectly clear that a great constitutional revolution was going on in Japan. About two centuries and a half ago the constitution was altered. Since that time the power of the Mikado had been in abeyance, the power of the great Daimios had been neutralized by their factions, and consequently the power of the Tycoon had been supreme. Now, for the first time, there was a change. The present Mikado, who was a young and ambitious man, was recovering some of his former power; of the Daimios some were making common cause with him, and others were bitterly and vehemently opposing the Tycoon, who, on account of the favour which he had shown to foreigners, had become probably the most unpopular man in Japan.

From all these causes we were, by interfering, as we had done, in danger of pulling down about our ears the whole fabric of the existing Government in Japan, which, bad or good, was at least a Government, and of having to undertake the responsibility of governing the country ourselves. That was a danger from which the Government had escaped in China owing to circumstances which they could not have anticipated, and for which they have not themselves to thank. He agreed substantially with everything which had fallen from the noble Earl and with all his Resolutions. The only one about which he entertained any doubt was the last but one, which proposed that our Government should enter into friendly communication with the Government of Japan and other Powers for the purpose of revising the treaty. If he thought that that Resolution was intended to compel the Government to take instantaneous action he could not support it; but as he believed that that was not its meaning he had no hesitation in accepting it according to the spirit rather than the letter, and agreeing to it as well as to the others.

EARL GREY said, that his noble Friend had rightly interpreted the meaning of his 11th Resolution. Throughout the discussion the Members of the Government had not contested these two facts—that the treaty being reciprocal, we were bound to enforce good conduct on the part of our own subjects in Japan, and that we had utterly failed to do so. That was established both by the statement of Sir Rutherford Alcock and by the despatches of the noble Earl himself. The noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) charged him with inconsistency, because he asked that as the treaty could not be enforced it should be revised. There was nothing inconsistent in his proposal. There were parts of the treaty which neither the Japanese nor ourselves could enforce, and therefore he proposed that they should be modified. The noble Earl (Earl Russell) had complained that he had suggested nothing for the future, but in another part of his speech he said that he had suggested too much.

WEST RIDING ASSIZES.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SMYTH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the event of the next Assizes for the West Riding of Yorkshire being held at Leeds, the maintenance of prisoners in the Leeds Borough Gaol, in accordance with the Notice in the Gazette of the 10th instant, will be a charge upon the County Rate of the West Riding, there being ample accommodation for such prisoners in the West Riding Prison at Wakefield?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, he could not give a positive opinion on the point. Hitherto the prisoners committed for trial at the Assizes for the West Riding had been sent to York Castle. [Colonel SMYTH: No; Wakefield.] That was after trial. He believed the fact to be, that whereas the county had been put to the expense of maintenance of prisoners committed for trial at York Castle, those prisoners would now be sent to Leeds instead, but they would have to be paid for as before by the county. The class of prisoners at present sent to Wakefield would continue to be sent to Wakefield.

INDIA—OFFICERS OF THE INDIAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, as by Clause 65 of his Despatch, dated the 17th day of June, No. 194, he recognizes that portion of the Report of the Commission on Memorials of the Indian Officers which stated that the organization given to the newly created Staff Corps has, contrary to the Parliamentary Guarantee, caused extensive supercession of the Officers remaining with their regiments; and as by paragraph 66 he admits that a complete remedy for this supercession must be found either in the withdrawal of the rank given to the Staff Corps or in granting such army rank to the Officers of the Indian Army, as shall restore them to a relative position, as regards the Staff Corps Officers, which they held at the formation of that corps; whether he considers that giving Brevet rank to the local Army, such rank in India giving no addition of pay whatever, restores the relative position of the Officers of the Indian Army to that of the Staff Corps, the latter possessing substantive rank with pay proportionate to their rank; and whether he considers this arrangement carries out the pledge which he gave that he would adopt the Report of the Commissioners in its integrity? Whereas the Staff Corps are on the full pay of their respective substantive ranks, whilst the local Army is to have Brevet rank without increase of pay, it is placing the local Army on the same footing as the Staff Corps to make the promotion from the rank of Lieutenant Colonel to Colonel to depend on an Officer having been five years on the full pay of a Lieutenant Colonel, as laid down in paragraph 69; and on what principle the Brevet rank of the Ordnance Corps in India is to be only local, as laid down in paragraph 70, the Parliamentary Guarantee extending to the Ordnance Corps as well as the rest of the Army?

COLONEL SYKES said, he would also beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, whether he will lay upon the table of the House a Return comprising the names of all Officers of the Indian Armies who had substantive rank given them by the East India Company, irrespective of promotion by regimental seniority, since the year 1800? Whether, in reference to paragraph 69 of the Despatch of the Secretary of State to the Governor General of India, dated June 17, 1864, the Army rank proposed to be given to regimental Officers after specified periods of service is to proceed pari passu with promotions to substantive rank in the Staff Corps, and whether he considers such Army rank a just equivalent for the substantive rank given to Staff Officers? And whether with reference to paragraph 76 of the same Despatch, all the Lieutenant Colonels in the Regimental Lists of the Indian Armies and Staff Corps are to be struck off immediately, and promotions made regimentally, according to the standing of the Regiment for the Line step, in conformity with the usages of the service?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that he had given no pledge to adopt the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Memorials of Indian Officers, for the simple reason that the Commissioners had carefully abstained from making any recommendations at all. They only stated what they considered to be the interpretation of the Parliamentary guarantee in regard to the organization given to the newly-created Staff Corps, and the alleged supercession of the Officers remaining with their regiments, and he frankly accepted that opinion. But that guarantee had no reference whatever to the employment or pay of the Officers, and therefore when the Officers of the local Army received brevet rank, he considered that this was a sufficient fulfilment of the guarantee in their regard, although the brevet rank carried with it no additional pay. The rank given to regimental Officers in respect to length of service had no connection with substantive rank in the Staff Corps. All the Officers in the Indian Army, whether of the Staff Corps or not, would receive their army rank in respect of length of service. The Officers of the Indian Army would stand in exactly the same relative seniority to each other as they did on the day that the Staff Corps was formed. With regard to the Ordnance Brevet rank being only local, he thought that the Ordnance Corps in India had received greater advantages than almost any other corps, and that they had not the slightest grievance to complain of.

NAVY—THE COURSE OF THE "GLADIATOR."—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the opinion of Vice Admiral Fitzroy, President of the Meteorological Department of the Board of Trade, has been taken as to the winds and currents which prevail in the Mid-Atlantic in the months of July, August, and September; and, if so, whether he will lay that opinion upon the table of the House; he might say, in explanation, that Admiral Fitzroy presided over a Department which had the winds and currents particularly under their consideration;—and whether the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty are aware that the facts set forth in Captain Maury's Trade Wind Chart for the month of August are in every respect opposed to the information given to the House by the noble

Colonel Sykes

Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, on the authority of the Hydrographer of the Navy?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied, that the Admiralty had not consulted Admiral Fitzroy; they had consulted their own Hydrographer. With regard to the latter part of the Question of the hon. Baronet, he had to state that the Admiralty regulations for the transport of the troops, so far from being in opposition to Captain Maury's views, were in exact accordance with them. Captain Maury's work gave the average passage of more than twenty sailing vessels for every month in the year for a distance of 820 miles on both sides of the line, and the result was that in the month of August, when the variable winds prevailed, the passage was made at the rate of 120 miles a day, and in March and November at the rate of 140. so that no great delay might be expected, SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to know, Whether the noble Lord will obtain the opinion of Admiral Fitzroy, and lay it upon the table?

HUDSON'S BAY TERRITORY.—PAPERS MOVED FOR.

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS said, he rose to call attention to the present condition of the territories claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company, and to move an Address for Copies of all Correspondence which had taken place between the Imperial and Canadian Governments respecting the Western Boundaries of Canada, and of any Memorials forwarded to the Colonial Office from the inhabitants of the Red River Settlement. He did not propose to enter into the question of the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, which had so often been the subject of inquiry in Parliament. It was generally admitted, he believed, that the territory claimed by the Company, comprising 1,500,000 square miles, was granted by a charter of Charles II. at a time when it did not belong to the British Crown. It was now admitted that in 1670 the vast territory now claimed by the Company was in the possession of the Crown of France, and was occupied by a French Company under a charter dated thirty or forty years before that of Charles II. It was notorious that by the Treaty of Ryswick, in 1696, it was admitted in the face of Europe that the territory belonged to the Crown of France. By the Treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, it was admitted that three-fourths of the territory belonged to France. It was not until the Treaty of Paris, in 1763, when Canada was ceded to England, that this territory became the property of the Crown of England. The territory was, therefore, granted by Charles II. to the Hudson's Bay Company 100 years before it became the property of the British Crown. It was also true, by the concurrent testimony of all our eminent legal authorities, from Lord Mansfield to Lord Westbury, that a prescription of 200 years, supported by Acts of Parliament reciting the rights of the Company, cured the defects of the title, however bad and rotten it might have been originally. Therefore, the question was one which was no longer open to dispute; at any rate, it would be unpractical and a mere waste of time to discuss the question now. But there was a question connected with this territory which was not altogether irrelevant at the present time. There was a tract of country containing 60,000 or 70,000 square miles, which—according to the evidence of witnesses examined before the Parliamentary Committee in 1857, including Sir George Simpson, Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and who had every interest to represent the territory as barren; Captain Palliser, who was officially appointed to inquire into the state of the country; Professor Hinde, also appointed to make the inquiry—comprised some of the most fertile land in the whole continent of North America. That territory was now practically shut up from colonization. It was perfectly true that this fertile territory was separated from Canada by a very barren and inhospitable tract of 500 miles, between Lake Superior and Lake Ontario. It was also true that up to this time no effort had been made to colonise that territory, and that the natural barrier which lay between it and the other possessions of the Crown was an impediment to colonization. The question now was, what openings offered themselves for the settlement of that territory. It was admitted by all that the connection of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by land by a continuous chain of settlements would be of immense advantage both in regard to the territories themselves and to our own interests in North America. The opening of the China trade through British territory would be of vast commercial importance. There was also no doubt whatever of the political importance of doing all in our power to form a bond of union among all our territories in North America. But the serious question was, who was to pay the costs of the operation? He apprehended the House of Commons was not prepared to spend any portion of the public money for founding Colonies in that part of British America; and he also apprehended that they would be very reluctant to give an Imperial guarantee to other parties who might be willing to undertake the task. But it so happened that in this instance the colony of Canada had come forward and expressed its readiness to undertake some share at all events of this large financial responsibility. He would briefly state how the case stood at the present moment. From the correspondence laid on the table it appeared that the colony of Canada was willing to guarantee 4 per cent upon £250,000, to be raised for the purpose of connecting the western frontier of Canada with the Red River Settlement; but the Colonial Government said they would undertake this obligation only on the condition that the boundaries of Canada should be properly defined. The hindrances to this arrangement were interposed by the Hudson's Bay Company. Last year that Company appeared in a new dress, but it had not lost its ancient character. They refused to go before any tribunal for arbitration—they would not open the question of boundary in any shape or form—but stood upon their ancient rights, which they were prepared to uphold. Thus Canada was balked in her efforts by obstacles interposed by the Hudson's Bay Company. The question was not whether we were to upset the charter—not whether Great Britain should undertake the expense of founding a Crown colony in Canada, but whether England was prepared to allow an obstruction to intervene between the colonization of that country and a colony which had manifested its readiness to undertake so important a share of the financial burden. In reply to an application from the Canadian Government for co-operation in this matter, Mr. Dallas wrote as follows:—

arrangements being come to, I am reluctantly compelled to admit my inability to meet the Government of Canada in this forward movement, for the following reasons:—The Red River and Saskatchewan valleys, though not in themselves fur-bearing districts, are the sources from whence the main supplies of winter food are procured for the northern posts, from the produce of the buffalo hunts. A chain of settlements through these valleys would not only deprive the Company of the above vital resource, but would indirectly, in many other ways, so interfere with their northern trade, as to render it no longer worth prosecuting on an extended scale. It would necessarily be divided into various channels, possibly to the public benefit, but the Company could no longer exist on its present footing."

The Earl of Carnarvon, writing on behalf of the Imperial Government, proposed to the Hudson's Bay Company the policy of acquiescing in the reference desired by the colony of Canada. He said—

"Before deciding finally upon the course to be pursued, he desires to place once more the question before the Hudson's Bay Company, with a sincere hope that on a fuller consideration they may see the expediency of modifying the determination which your letter announced. Where on all sides interests so great and various are concerned, the wisest and most dignified course will be found, as Sir E. Bulwer Lytton has on previous occasions pointed out, in an appeal to and a decision by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, with the concurrence alike of Canada and of the Hudson's Bay Company. If the adoption of such a procedure be advantageous to the interests of all parties concerned, Sir Edward cannot but think it would be particularly for the interest of the Hudson's Bay Company. It would afford a tribunal pre-eminently fitted for the dispassionate consideration of the questions at issue; it would secure a decision which would probably be rather of the nature of an arbitration than of a judgment; and it would furnish a basis of negotiation on which reciprocal concession and the claims for compensation could be most successfully discussed."

The question was, whether the Hudson's Bay Company were to be allowed to stand in the way of the public advantage? He believed that Parliament would not consider it right that the Hudson's Bay Company should stand in the way of establishing settlements, especially when those who were to derive the benefit of them were prepared to bear their full share of the burden involved in making them. He had brought the question before the House in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies would state that no obstruction to the plan would be offered on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He was quite aware that there were good reasons why Great Britain alone should not undertake the responsibility of planting a colony in that quarter. He was fully aware that there were great difficulties yet in store with respect to the boundaries between British North America and the United States—there were questions arising respecting the defence of our colonial possessions—respecting the Red River Settlement—and there was a strong probability that that Settlement would have a large influx of immigrants from the States. It appeared to him that if the opportunity were afforded of helping on the federal union of our North American colonies, enabling the colonists to unite themselves by commercial intercourse with the Atlantic and the Pacific, not only would our trade with China be opened, but a chain of settlements would be formed binding the colonists more closely together. While he believed it would be inexpedient that England herself should undertake a new settlement in North America, he nevertheless thought that a policy which would enable the existing colonies to unite themselves by a chain of settlements between the two oceans, would be wise, dignified, and prudent—regard being had to the time when the vast territory to which he referred would contain self-supporting communities. Although the political difficulties were considerable, he believed that those difficulties might be overcome. The question was one of considerable importance; and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would indicate some means by which the differences between Canada and the Hudson's Bay Company might be cleared up by a reference to the Judicial Committee of Council or some other tribunal before which the questions could be tried; because, if they stood over, the time might come when Canada might say, "We offered to bear our part of the cost; impediments were offered; we were not allowed to settle our boundaries, we could not go forward, and were prevented from doing that which we were desirous of accomplishing." There were, moreover, quite enough points of argument between ourselves and our neighbours in North America (such as the San Juan question, and others) standing over for adjudication, without adding to them "Hudson's Bay and Red River questions" for future controversy. On all these grounds he sincerely hoped that the settlement of this vast and fertile territory would not be left to the chances of desultory immigration, and that no hindrance at all events would be offered to those who might be prepared to undertake its colonization on the part of the Imperial Government.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of all Correspondence which has taken place between the Imperial and Canadian Governments respecting the Western Boundaries of Canada, and of any Memorials forwarded to the Colonial Office from the inhabitants of the Red River Settlement,"—(Mr. Arthur Mills),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. WATKIN said, the few words with which he should trouble the House could be offered rather as evidence in the case than as intended to convey any peculiar views of his own. He had understood that the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Mover of the Resolution, had laid down the proposition, upon what authority he knew not, that Canada was ready to assume the cost and responsibility of founding a new colony in the vast territory belonging to or at least in the possession of the Hudson's Bay Company; a colony, in fact, which would become one of a great chain of communities between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS explained that what he had meant was merely that Canada was ready to be responsible for a large proportion of the cost of establishing telegraphic and other communication across the continent.

MR. WATKIN: Really the hon. Gentleman, before bringing so large a question before the House, ought to have taken more pains to be accurate. All that Canada had proposed to do was to contribute so much a year, about £10,000, in aid of the construction of a telegraph, and towards providing the means of a postal and passenger transit across the continent. And at the instance of the late Colonial Minister, the Duke of Newcastle, a proposition had been made in May, 1863, which, if at once accepted, would have led to the achievement of that great object. The Duke communicated that proposition in a despatch bearing that date, to both Canada and British Columbia; and Canada, after keeping the despatch unanswered from May, 1863, to the end of February, 1864, at last declined to proceed, and on not over creditable grounds. The House might remember that the late Government of Canada went out of office early in March last, and on the eve of leaving office they drew up the minute refusing their assistance. Possibly they might not have replied at all, but in the month of February the Colonial Office informed them—as the papers now before the House showed—that British Columbia regarded the proposals with deep interest, and only waited for the decision of Canada in order to forward, as was expected, a favourable reply. Knowing, then, that their refusal would throw over the whole project—for, if refused, British Columbia could not comply—the late Government entirely backed out of their own proposal. And on what ground? why, that the Duke's despatch proposed the erection of a telegraph only. Now, a reference to the despatch itself would show that this plea was unfounded; and he might state that personal explanations had been given to the members of this very Government, so that the House could only assume that those who then guided the affairs of Canada did not desire, as represented by the hon. Member, to see so truly Imperial a work carried out with vigour and certainty. In fact, in their hands and by their delays and excuses and unwillingness, Canada, and Canada only, had stood in the way. The blame, therefore, he regretted to say, must, so far, rest with Canada and not with Her Majesty's Colonial Office or with the Hudson's Bay Company, as was, no doubt, upon erroneous information alleged by the hon. Member. The fault, however, attached to the Government and not to the people of Canada. But the question before the House was much larger, and it involved consequences demanding the most serious and anxious consideration of Parliament. The question came to this—Was this vast territory, above four times as large as Great Britain, worth the attention of the Colonial Office and deserving of the care of that House? Was it worth the while of the House and the Government to consider the future settlement and destiny of a vast and fertile region capable of containing from thirty to fifty millions of free people? The time has almost come when the House must decide whether that region should be peopled with British subjects, or become part of the American union. Regarding the question as affecting Imperial interests—and the consideration of those interests only could guide the House—he felt assured that hon. Members would desire to preserve this territory to the British Crown. Let the House bear in mind that it was considering a portion of the earth's surface at least as large as Russia in Europe. Then came the practical question—could this territory be governed and defended by Canada, or ought it to become a separate and distinct colony under the control of the Crown? Now, so far from Canada, as a whole, desiring to hold itself responsible for the establishment and defence of a new colony, the great bulk of Canadian statesmen—especially in the present state of Canadian finance and Canadian defence—would oppose it. Canada could not just now afford the risk, and it must be remembered that the very men who had repudiated the Duke's despatch, and had backed out of the overland communication, had been in all ways backward as regarded the military defence of the colony itself. They, at least, after refusing to provide adequately for the defence of Canada, would not take the new burden of defending an additional border of 1,500 miles alongside the United States. But the House would bear in mind that a question had, with more or less vehemence, agitated the minds of the Canadian people, namely, that of "Representation by Population." When the union of Lower and Upper Canada was declared, the population of Lower Canada much exceeded that of Upper Canada. Now, however, the population of Upper Canada exceeded that of Lower Canada by some 300,000; and a party in Upper Canada asked for a proportionate representation. Such a measure would of course enable Upper Canada to rule over and destroy the individualization of Lower Canada. Therefore, all French-speaking Canadians, and a large number of the most loyal people in both sections of the province, opposed a change leading inevitably to universal suffrage and the extinction of the political influence of an educated minority. Now, if the Hudson's Bay territory were added to Upper Canada, that portion of the province would overbear the remainder, and all the old contests of race and language would be revived, even perhaps to the end of civil war. He entirely forebore to speak about title, that would settle itself; it was a purely legal question. The question before the House was one of Government. The hon. Gentleman talked of the rights of Canada—meaning, he supposed, that Canada could and would govern, and, if govern, defend. Now Canada was a country 1,500 miles long and 500 to 600 miles broad. It had a population strewn over this area of only 3,000,000—or less than the population of London. Yet, forsooth, the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to charge this small population with the defence and Government of a new country nearly twice as big as its own, notwithstanding that Fort Garry—the chief settlement of the Hudson's Bay territory—was 1,000 miles from the nearest place at present deserving the name of a settlement belonging to Canada. But while the hon. Gentleman advocated a chain of settlements, forming ultimately one continuous British population between the two oceans, he deprecated any Imperial expenditure on account of such an Imperial purpose. His proposal on behalf of Canada was unauthorized and must break down. It was imperative that any new colony must be founded upon the prestige of the British Empire and its flag. No other foundation would preserve British influence. Either that must happen or a rapid process of Americanization would go on. Already the country was being squatted over by American citizens and soldiers, while the Colonial Office did nothing. But the hon. Gentleman referred to the cost of founding new colonies. Now, the people of the United States founded new communities, and organized their Government, without saddling the Union itself with any permanent expense whatever; they derived their resources from the sale of lands and the taxation of the settlers. And in so fine a region as this, if the British Government could not found a new colony without coming to the Imperial Exchequer except for temporary advances or assistance, the fault must be attributed to mismanagement and incapacity at the Colonial Office. As regarded the alleged impediments to the settlement of the Hudson's Bay territory, he must repeat that the late Canadian, and not the Imperial Government, was responsible. The monied and commercial classes here in England were ready to co-operate liberally; but the confidence in the bona fides of Canada must be first restored. Was it not extraordinary that in the year 1864 a private company of fur traders should rule and govern about a fourth of the whole North American continent, and that a charter of Charles II. should permit such a private company in London to levy war with Indian tribes, to build fortifications, and to have, in fact, if they thought fit, an army of defence?

Unless Her Majesty's Government were prepared to take more immediate and practical action, nothing could prevent the alienation of this territory, which ought to become in every sense an integral part of the Empire. The House had had to listen to much discussion for years past; the time for action had arrived. Was the House prepared longer to allow the matter to drift its own way; to permit American squatters to secure the most valuable lands, and American influence to predominate, when by hoisting the British flag and giving to the people of Red River the moral influence of the British Crown, they could render this territory one of the most valuable and hopeful of all the British dependencies?

MR. CARDWELL said, he would offer no objection to the production of any papers that remained of the copious Correspondence already presented on the subject. He trusted, however, under these circumstances, that his hon. Friend would not expect him to enter at length into the question she had raised; for if he were to go through the whole history of the matter, he would enter a territory as vast as that of the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1857 a Committee of that House, which had been appointed to inquire into the subject, recommended that Canada should be permitted, if she thought proper, to annex the territories in question, so that they might thereafter form a part of the Canadian possessions; and acting on that suggestion the Colonial Secretary submitted certain propositions to Canada and to the Hudson's Bay Company. The Government, acting under the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, felt it was impossible to dispute the validity of a charter which had existed for two centuries; but they made the very suggestion alluded to by his hon. Friend—that the question of the western boundaries of Canada should be referred to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Hudson's Bay Company assented; but Canada demanded that the Privy Council should consider, not merely the question of boundaries, but the whole validity of the charter. To this proposition the Company naturally would not consent. The noble Lord who was then Colonial Secretary was succeeded by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir E. Bulwer-Lytton) who, under the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, informed the Canadian Government that if they wished to challenge the charter of the Company they must do so by a scire facias in the Court of Queen's Bench. The Canadian Government, however, refused to take any steps to settle the question. The right hon. Gentleman gave full notice that in that case he should feel at liberty to endeavour to settle the question by negotiation. In 1862 negotiations were commenced with his noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle by a company who proposed to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by means of telegraphic and postal communication. Ultimately the Hudson's Bay Company became united in interest with the persons who promoted that scheme, and the negotiations were carried to this point—that it was agreed the Hudson's Bay Company should be compensated for their interest in the territory out of the proceeds of the sale of portions of the land. The principle was adopted, but the details were not settled. At that stage of the matter he (Mr. Cardwell) succeeded to the office he had now the honour to occupy. He had anticipated the desire expressed by the hon. Gentleman, that every facility should be afforded to Canada to take part in the negotiations on this subject. He had informed the Company that if any colony was to be founded in that territory provision for the settlement and good government of the new colony must be made by themselves, by the Canadian Government, or by the Crown; and he renewed the offer made on the recommendation of the Committee of 1857. At the same time he had called on the Canadian Government, if they were not disposed to take upon themselves the responsibility, to state distinctly what were their views on the boundary question, in order that negotiations might be set on foot for the amicable settlement of the dispute. This question involved points of very great difficulty. It was connected with chartered rights of great antiquity. The matter before the House was also connected with the position of the intercolonial railway, which still remained in suspense in Canada, and it was connected, moreover, with the proposal that Canada should maintain at her own expense communication by telegraph and post road with the point at which the telegraph of the Hudson's Bay Company should join the Canadian system. Canada had not yet given her adhesion to that proposal; and the question of the Canadian guarantee of half the cost of the telegraph was also still in abeyance, which was likewise the case with the proposal that the other half should be guaranteed by Vancouver's Island and British Columbia. It also remained undecided whether, if a new settlement were to be established, it should be founded at the expense of the present Hudson's Bay Company, of Canada, or of the Imperial Exchequer. Canada would shortly receive from him an offer based on the recommendations of the Committee of 1857. But the matter was one of great importance, and would have to be maturely considered. With the view of bringing the whole affair to a satisfactory result, he had written to his noble Friend the Governor General of Canada a despatch which, as an answer to the Motion of the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Arthur Mills) he would be glad to lay on the table. He invited the Canadian Government to state whether they were prepared to accept the conditions recommended by the Committee of the House of Commons; and, if not, to intimate what their views were respecting the question of the western boundary? That difficult question it would be his endeavour to bring to a satisfactory conclusion; but all he would say at present was that no pledge would be given on his part without the previous knowledge and consent of the House.

MR. LYALL said, it was not true that the Hudson's Bay Company had sent out telegraphic wires for the purpose of connecting Minnesota with the Red River Settlement, and thereby increasing the influence of the United States in the Hudson's Bay territory. The Directors who came into office a year ago took into consideration the subject of communication between Columbia and Canada in association with the question of communication with China, and they had sent out wires for that purpose. But certainly if Canada were not prepared to do her part in overcoming the natural difficulties of the country between her and the Red River Settlement, it would be necessary for the Company to connect their telegraph with Minnesota, from which they were only distant about fifty miles. With respect to the new government of the Company, they were by no means disposed to retard colonization; they waited, however, for roads and other communications; and it was felt, moreover, that greater powers than were given by their proprietary charter must be obtained by the Company in order to establish good order in the settlement. The whole subject was under the consideration of the Colonial Office, and he trusted that an extended colonization of a great territory would be promoted.

COLONEL SYKES urged the great importance of communication with British Columbia. We could not get there at all except by Panama and Cape Horn. So that Columbia were connected with Canada, what mattered whether the communication were effected by the colony of Canada or by an independent Company? The result would be that a direct communication with China would be established. The undertaking was one of great importance; and if it could be effected by a little pressure upon the Hudson's Bay Company it would be politic for the Government to exercise it. The hon. Gentleman who brought the question forward was entitled to the thanks of the House for so doing.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS IN IRELAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BLAKE rose to call the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the necessity which exists for amending the Laws relating to the administration of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland, and for making better provision for the care of Imbeciles confined in the Union Workhouses; and to inquire whether he will introduce a Bill next Session to remedy the defects complained of? For the last three years he had each Session called the attention of Government to the serious defects which existed in the moral treatment, with a few exceptions, in the Lunatic Asylums of Ireland; and in his efforts to have a proper system introduced, he had never been fortunate to obtain much support from the Irish Members. Nevertheless, the question had gained ground, and some good results had followed. He should do the Chief Secretary for Ireland the justice to say that the representations which he had made to him on the subject had not been disregarded, as he had given a good deal of attention to it, both by visiting asylums and endeavouring, as far as he could, to effect a reform in the direction which he had frequently pointed out to him as most necessary. He considered it was only just towards the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, as well as towards some of the Managers of these institutions in the country, to say that within the last two years an undoubted improvement had taken place in many of the asylums, so far as regarded increased suitable occupation and amusement for the patients, although in some much remained to be done. It was also very pleasing to see in the last published Report of the Inspectors, that that portion of the treatment in each of the asylums had a prominent place in their remarks. On the present occasion he would only allude to it incidentally in suggesting some legislation which he thought would materially aid the carrying out improved moral treatment. If the suggestions he was about to offer for amending the laws relating to Lunatic Asylums had not the merit for the most part of originality, they had at least what was much better, which was the fact of many of them being so manifestly necessary that they had been recommended for adoption by much higher authority than he was. Nearly all would be found in the Report of the Royal Commissioners appointed in 1857 to inquire into the state of the Irish Asylums, which consisted of men of great ability and eminence, amongst them one of the foremost physicians in the empire, Dr. Corrigan. Subsequently the noble Lord the Member for Cocker mouth (Lord Naas), then Chief Secretary for Ireland, introduced a Bill, in which also might be found many of his (Mr. Blake's) suggestions on the present occasion. The Royal Commission recommended that the asylums should be under the direction of a central board, to consist of three salaried members, who should also act as Inspectors—two to be of the medical profession, one of the legal. To that recommendation he would add three more Commissioners, who should be salaried, so far as paying them one or two guineas each for every time they attended a meeting of the board: this would not entail a cost of more than a couple of hundred a year, and would be certain to secure a punctual attendance. To this Commissioner he would delegate nearly all the duties now performed by the Privy Council in reference to asylums, and would, in certain cases, give the Lord Lieutenant a veto. As things then stood, nearly all the control devolved on the Inspectors; as the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council must necessarily be influenced by their recommendations; and without at all intending to disparage those gentlemen, for whom he entertained the highest respect, he thought it would be far better to have some other gentlemen associated with them in the direction of the asylums, especially as their duties would every day increase from the additional asylums in progress of construction. The present board of control would, of course, merge into the new Commission. He thought that, for purposes of inspection, Ireland ought to be divided into two districts, assigning one to each Inspector, who would thus have a greater responsibility than at present, and more inducements to forward the asylum intrusted to him. It would promote a desirable emulation, as each Inspector would naturally endeavour not to have the asylum of his district inferior to those of his colleague. Power should also be given to the Lord Lieutenant to appoint for particular purposes, when occasion called for it, a special Commissioner to hold investigations and report. This would prove most useful at times when there might be a great difference of opinion between a local board and the Inspectors, and when it would be desirable to have the assistance of a person who would be certain to be totally unprejudiced. Two-thirds of the governors of asylums ought to be appointed by the grand jury, and in certain instances by town councils; or, in the event of transferring the maintenance of lunatics to the poor rates—as ought to be done—the appointment to be made by the guardians. One-third of the boards might be left to be nominated by the Lord Lieutenant, which would be always sufficient to secure a fair representation from the gentry. It was manifestly unfair, that whilst the asylums were maintained from grand jury rates, that that body had no voice whatever in appointing those who were to administer them. There were many other objections to vesting such power in the hands of the Government. Dr. Nugent, in his evidence before the Royal Commission, stated that the governors were usually appointed on the recommendation of the Inspectors. Such a practice was most undesirable. It was for the interest of the asylums that the governors should in every respect be wholly independent of either Inspectors or local medical officers. If the Government were usually guided in their selection by the recommendation of the Inspectors, it was not going too far to assume that the latter, in their turn, were often influenced in their selection by the local officers; and it was only natural that the latter would not recommend any one likely to be unfriendly to them, or who would not accord in their views. He believed the independence and efficiency of many local boards was much impaired by the mode in which they were appointed. To a board constituted in the way he had suggested, he would give the appointment of all the superior officers, subject to the approval of the central board or the Lord Lieutenant. On this subject the Royal Commissioners justly observed—

“As regards the appointment of superior officers, resident and medical physician, &c., we consider they should be left to the governors. The evidence we have received is to a great, perhaps preponderating extent, opposed to this power being given to the governors. But, as a general principle, we do not see why the executive Government should interfere in these matters, or that its interference has, or is likely to lead to, a better selection of officers than would be made by the local authorities. It is true, as has been stated, that the appointment of these officers may tend to local contention, and that private feeling may prevail to the prejudice of the institution. We think there is not a little reason to believe that political influence might lead to an equally unfortunate result.”

Out of the 4,506 patients in asylums, only 1,135 were returned as probably curable; and of the 3,371 incurable, there were many in a state of hopeless idiocy, and, unfortunately, occupied the place of many insane confined in gaols or workhouses, or with their families, who, if placed early under curative treatment, might have a chance of recovery, which was lessened every hour they were out of the asylum. Some arrangement ought to be made by which many of the hopeless tranquil cases, where the mind had sunk into fatuity or idiocy, belonging to two or more counties, could be sent to special institutions, and thus relieve the asylums of their care, and make room for hopeful cases. Power should be given to magistrates to commit dangerous lunatics direct to asylums, instead of sending them to prison, where they could not be so well cared for, or have the same chance of recovery. Boards should be empowered to receive and enforce payment from patients capable of contributing in the whole or part for their maintenance. There was considerable doubt as to the law on the subject, which ought to be settled. In some places, boards sought and obtained payment from parties capable of paying, whilst elsewhere they considered themselves not entitled to do so. A great burden was, therefore, thrown on the ratepayers—for example, at Limerick there appeared to be seven patients well able to pay who were supported out of the rates. Boards should also be empowered to send strange lunatics to their own localities. In the larger towns, particularly seaports, persons after only residing a short time, or perhaps only passing through, were sent to the asylum, and became a charge on a district to which they did not belong. Central boards should have the power of fixing the dietaries of asylums. The quantity and description of food was a most important element in the treatment of insanity, and on no account should be left to the discretion of local boards, who, as a rule, could not be competent to determine what should be given to patients. The dietary table in various institutions varied considerably; and in some instances the Inspectors had remarked on the insufficiency. These gentlemen and the other Commissioners should have the power of absolutely determining on the dietary; and on them should also devolve the duty of laying down regulations for the moral treatment, and ordering to be provided all necessary appliances for the occupation and amusement of the patients. The judicious employment and recreation of a lunatic was the most important part of the curative treatment; and those who, like the Inspectors, were supposed to be best informed as to what was necessary to soothe and restore the diseased mind to its healthy state, should have as ample powers to have everything provided for the purpose as to insist that good and sufficient medicine was furnished for the bodily ailments of the patients. It would be most desirable if the Inspectors would, as he believed they were bound to do by Act of Parliament, furnish to each member of the local boards a copy of the Report relative to his own asylum. The expense would be very small, and the probable advantages considerable, as governors would then be made aware of the state of progress and requirements of their asylum, of which many knew very little. Many governors never even once attended the asylum from their appointment—often extending over a period of twenty years; several others, perhaps, once in two or three years. There ought, therefore, to be an enactment by which governors who, not being either ill or away from the locality, absent themselves from a certain number of stated meetings in succession, should forfeit their position on the board. As some medical officers of asylums excused themselves from taking their patients outside the asylum for exercise and recreation, on the ground that it would be illegal to do so, the practice ought to be legalized, as, with proper precaution, there was little or no danger to be apprehended, and the gratification and advantage to the patients was considerable. No doubt the system pursued in an asylum should be a good one before patients were brought to that tranquil, orderly state when they could be trusted outside; indeed, it was a great test of their progress; and it was, therefore, a great pity that incompetent or inefficient medical officers were afforded an excuse which their convenient interpretation of the law furnished them for not following the example of more zealous and better qualified officers. While on this point of the subject, he would allude to the great necessity in all future appointments of resident medical officers in making a theoretical and practical knowledge of the treatment of insanity an absolute condition; and that no one should be eligible unless he produced a certificate of having, for at least six months, resided in or attended and watched the practice in an hospital for the insane for that period. Besides this, they should undergo an examination before the Inspectors without whose certificate of competency they could not be appointed. As a rule, under every Government political influence went before every other consideration in making the appointments, and the unfortunate lunatics were the sufferers. Means of clinical instruction should be provided in some of the larger asylums. The criminal one would probably be best, as being altogether under Government control. There was nothing the Royal Commissioners more strongly urged than the absolute necessity which existed for clinical instruction; but this recommendation, as well as others equally useful, had been totally disregarded. The chaplaincy question was one which imperatively called for legislation. Fortunately, the only instance where a board had persisted in refusing to appoint a chaplain was that of Belfast; but even that was sufficient to call for the interference of the Legislature. He believed, without exception, every eminent authority concurred in recommending judicious religious ministrations as a most important agent in promoting the happiness and recovery of the insane; in fact, an essential link in the chain of curative treatment. Some few boards in Ireland had for a time resisted the appointment of chaplains—sometimes supported in their views by the medical officers—but they gradually gave in, and all had acknowledged that beneficial results had followed. Belfast alone still stood out. The Commissioners had closely inquired into the question, and reported strongly in favour of chaplains being appointed. The Inspectors, in their annual Reports, did the same. Successive Lord Lieutenants had made the appointments; but, owing to the state of the law, the board successfully resisted the payment of the salaries. The Catholic and Protestant Bishops, and, he believed, one Presbyterian member of the board, were in favour of chaplains. On yesterday he had a conversation with the Right Rev. Dr. Knox, Protestant Bishop of Down, on the subject, who told him that whilst the Protestant chaplain had been acting, his flock appeared to derive much comfort and benefit, and no unpleasantness of any kind had occurred. His Lordship also stated that he had written to all the asylums in Ireland to ascertain whether the appointment of chaplains had turned out satisfactorily, and the answers were in the affirmative. From the communications the Most Rev. Dr. Denvir had favoured him with on the subject, he found him equally anxious as the Protestant Bishop to be enabled to afford the portion of his congregation in the asylum spiritual ministrations. He trusted, therefore, with all this concurrent testimony on the subject, that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would give an assurance that Government would take steps to afford the poor inmates of the Belfast Asylum the same means of religious consolation that the insane of every institution of the kind in the empire were in possession of, with acknowledged comfort and advantage. There was only one more reference he would make to Lunatic Asylums. In whatever Bill might be introduced to amend the laws relating to them, there ought to be a clause placing their maintenance on the poor rates. It was a strange and unjust anomaly that, while a sane pauper was maintained at the joint expense of landlord and tenant, he would, if he became insane, become chargeable altogether on the tenant. Having occupied so much time on the subject of Lunatic Asylums, he should touch very briefly on the second part of his Motion relative to idiots. For that unfortunate class there was, unhappily, no adequate provision for their care in Ireland. They were, unfortunately, very numerous, being nearly equal to the lunatic class; and whilst for the latter there were sixteen public asylums and several others in course of construction, besides many private institutions, there was not a single one for idiots. The pauper ones were placed in workhouses, and the others were at large or with their families, but no effort whatever was made to endeavour to cultivate those faculties of their mind which were not obliterated. Until lately it was thought that this unfortunate class were incapable of cultivation, but experiment had proved the contrary. The hon. Member having read a description of the improved condition of the patients at Earlswood, many of whom had been so far instructed as to be able to go out and earn their living, and an extract from the Report of the Census Commissioners in 1861, proceeded to say that he could not conclude without thanking the House for the very patient hearing they had given him on a subject which he felt conscious was far from being generally interesting; but he trusted his having trespassed at such length would be excused when he assured them that bringing such subjects before Parliament was almost the only way of having evils remedied or reforms accomplished. He hoped he would receive an assurance from the right hon. Baronet that he would introduce measures next Session to remedy the laws relating to Lunatic Asylums, and also to initiate something for the benefit of the more unfortunate class of whom he last spoke. The right hon. Baronet would probably tell him that much that he had suggested regarding lunatics could be accomplished by the Privy Council rules. No doubt that was true, but he respectfully asked why the Privy Council did not do what was necessary? If they did so, there need not be legislation on all the points he had touched on; and an act would only be required for what the Council could not effect. Although he felt he had but feebly pleaded on behalf of those for whom he felt the deepest compassion and interest, he ventured to hope that he had made it manifest to the House that humanity and policy alike called on us to endeavour to mitigate still further the misfortunes of those whom Providence in its wisdom had visited with the most fearful of all afflictions.

MR. BAGWELL said, he doubted the expediency of giving the appointment of officers to the governors of asylums, as owing to the violence of party feeling in Ireland they could not be sure that in every case the best men would be employed. He was not fond of central boards, and any change in the direction of striking off governors who did not attend ought to be made very carefully, as the ratepayers of outlying districts were not the less entitled to representation. He believed that the Irish Lunatic Asylums were in general very admirably conducted; but there was one point to which he attached very great importance—namely, the training of the resident physician. He thought these officers should receive a special training, and that they should acquire a practical knowledge of the treatment and cure of the insane by residence and study in some of the great lunatic establishments in England.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he willingly bore testimony to the zeal and humane spirit which had actuated his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford in bringing the matter before the House. He could not, however, agree with his hon. Friend that further legislation on this subject was needed. The fact that this subject had not been lost sight of by the Irish Government was proved by the circumstance that since 1821 fifteen separate Acts of Parliament had been passed specially dealing with the treatment of the insane poor of Ireland. He quite concurred with the hon. Member for Clonmel in thinking that the resident physicians should be educated with a more especial eye to the duties they had to perform; but even in the present day, with the aid of the consulting physicians, they were able to deal with the unfortunate persons under their charge in a manner much more satisfactory than was formerly the case. Not having been able to catch as accurately as he could desire the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Waterford, the written outline of the points in which he felt interested, furnished by his hon. Friend, would enable him to deal in detail with those various matters. As regarded the appointment of a central board, his idea was that the local authorities, with the supervision of the central Government, ought to have the main direction of the institutions. Dr. Nugent and Dr. Hatchell, the present Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, performed their duties to the satisfaction of the public, and he was always anxious that the poor inmates should be treated with every consideration. Under the existing rules and regulations the Lord Lieutenant had power to direct a special inquiry, and only recently a case occurred at Clonmel which Dr. Hatchell was sent down to investigate.

MR. BLAKE said, what he contemplated was the appointment of a special Inspector, distinct from the regular officials.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he did not think the division of Ireland into districts like those rendered compulsory by the Prisons Act would be advisable in the case of Lunatic Asylums. It was important that it should not be known beforehand what Inspector was to hold the inquiry. With regard to appointments, it was proposed in 1859 by the Ministry of that day to vest these in the governors; but the measure was strongly opposed by Liberal Members, and the present arrangement, which gave to each of the political parties in turn a share of the patronage, was, he thought, preferable. There were 16,000 of these poor creatures altogether in district Lunatic Asylums, poor houses, gaols, and private asylums. A great many boards were taking steps for affording recreation and amusement to these poor patients. It was also of great importance that chaplains should be provided for these institutions. That subject had occupied the attention of successive Lord Lieutenants. The Earl of Clarendon, the Earl of Eglinton, the Earl of St. Germans, and the present Lord Lieutenant, agreed that every Lunatic Asylum ought to have a chaplain attached to it. The Belfast Asylum was now the only one without a chaplain. Representations had been made to the board of the asylum that the patients ought to have the advantage of devotional services, but the board had hitherto resisted these appeals. Bearing in mind the great advantages that had resulted in other establishments from the services of clergymen of different denominations, he could not but think it very desirable that the deficiency should be supplied. At Londonderry, after holding out for a long time, the board agreed to make the trial. They had since reported that the effect of the ministrations of the chaplain upon the minds of the poor patients was most remarkable. It was thought that religious controversies might arise; but Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, and Episcopalian ministers attended at different hours, and the proceedings were conducted with perfect harmony. The majority of the cases in these asylums were chronic, and the patients were collected and rational, except in regard to the particular delusion in which their insanity was manifested. In the Report presented to the Lord Chancellor by the Commissioners of Lunacy in England, of whom Lord Shaftesbury was chairman, it was stated that the patients looked forward with pleasure to the performance of Divine service, and regarded their exclusion from it as a privation. They added that the prayers of the Church exercised a soothing influence even upon insane hearers. A great deal had been done of late to promote the cure and comfort of this unhappy class of persons. There were at present seventeen Lunatic Asylums in active operation. Six other Lunatic Asylums were now being built; so that the complaints that these patients were placed in gaols would soon be obviated. When these six additional Lunatic Asylums were opened, 235 of the 389 insane persons now confined in gaols would be removed to them, leaving the balance in the Dublin district. He had been in communication with the grand juries, and something would, he hoped, be done to relieve the Richmond Asylum from the pressure that fell upon it from the Dublin district. The imbeciles confined in the union workhouses in Ireland were not less than 2,400, two-thirds of whom were women. They were for the most part in a state of harmless imbecility, and it would be better to leave them there. The Boards of Guardians were giving them an increased dietary, and it was not desirable to establish large asylums for the reception of these hopeless idiots. The cost of a patient in a Lunatic Asylum averaged £20, while the cost of an insane pauper in a union workhouse was only £10. To transfer these harmless imbeciles from the workhouse to the Lunatic Asylum would, therefore, be attended by great expense, without any corresponding good. He trusted that after this explanation the hon. Gentleman would not press the subject any further.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in the satisfaction which he expressed with reference to the centralized power. They were unanimous in Ireland in their wish to manage their local affairs themselves. In his own county they were most anxious to have the appointment of the governors, or some of the governors, because they wanted to check extravagance; but though he had been many years a Member of Parliament, the Irish Executive had taken care that he should have nothing to do with the management of the Lunatic Asylum in his county. He desired to draw attention to one point, which was the difficulty that existed at the present moment in getting a criminal lunatic removed to an asylum. He hoped the Government would take the subject into consideration, in order to remedy the inconvenience.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he agreed with almost all that had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary, and that no unfortunate people were better taken care of than the lunatics of Ireland. He thought, however, that the taxpayers ought to have some control over the appointment of governors and medical officers.

MR. CORBALLY bore testimony, as governor of an asylum, to the fact that the inmates were well cared for. The only fault he had to find with the management of the institutions was the difficulty of getting people in. When a person was suddenly struck with madness, a week or a fortnight might elapse before he could be got into an asylum. He would suggest that, as medical officers were at hand, a certificate of insanity might be obtained without delay, and the afflicted person removed at once to the institution.

INNS OF COURT.—PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, the Commission to whose Report I wish to call, or rather to recall, the attention of the House, was appointed on the 5th of May, 1854, and reported on the 10th of August, 1855. During that period, and for some time after it, the mind of the country was so wholly engrossed by the Russian war, that it had no time or thought to spare, even for matters so closely touching its daily life as those to which the present Lord Chancellor and other Members of this Commission hardly less distinguished had been devoting so much of their scanty leisure. The Report, which goes to the root of the question, as to what guarantees society has a right to demand for help in legislation, as well as for the intelligent and efficient administration of the law, treats of the discipline of the property and of the educational system pursued in those great and ancient institutions, the Inns of Court. With regard to the first of these subjects, I shall say nothing, because it is already in other hands. With regard to the second, I shall only say what every one will agree to, that it is a most truly lamentable thing that so large an amount of gross revenue as that possessed by the Inns of Court should produce such a very small amount of available

net income which can be applied to promote the study of law and jurisprudence; and I am sure many will think that the Commissioners were right in saying that, having regard to the great value of the site of these institutions, a doubt arises whether some mode might not be devised of rendering their property more productive, without departing from the purposes for which these societies were formed. I mean to confine myself to the third subject discussed in the Report—that is, to the part which the Inns of Court ought to take in facilitating and guarding the access to the bar. This subject has been frequently discussed in Parliament during the last twenty years, and I think I may say that the invariable result of its discussion in this building has been some reform in that gloomy but most important quarter of this great city, which stretches from Gray's Inn to the river. In the year 1846 Mr. Wyse moved for a Committee to inquire into the state of legal education in Ireland, and it was made an instruction to that Committee that it should inquire also into the state of legal education in England. The result was a most interesting Report, which was presented in August, 1846. Some time appears then to have been allowed to pass, in order that it might be seen whether the Inns of Court meant to take any steps to remedy the extraordinary and altogether disastrous state of things which had been disclosed by the evidence, and had been severely condemned by the Report; but I find from Hansard that on the 4th of July, 1848, a gentleman whom many of us will remember taking an important part in our discussions, and sitting on the other side of the House—I mean Mr. George Anthony Hamilton—asked whether anything was being done to carry out the suggestions of the Committee, and was informed, in reply, that the Inns of Court were holding conferences with the view of effecting a reform. The subject seems to have slumbered, as far as this House was concerned, till April, 1852, when my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries elicited from the Attorney General of that day the very agreeable information that the Inns of Court had made a very real beginning of improvement by establishing a Council of Legal Education, by creating five readerships, by allowing such students as desired it to present themselves for examination, and encouraging them to do so by the offer of various rewards. No one of any authority doubted that this was a step in the right direction, but many thought that the Inns had not gone nearly far enough, and in the latter part of the Session of 1852 a short discussion took place in another place, in which Lord Campbell, while apologizing for more not being done, very clearly showed it to be his opinion that the then recent changes could only be considered as an instalment, while Lord Brougham and Lord Lyndhurst declared, in the strongest possible way, that the examination at the threshold of the bar should be not voluntary, but compulsory. The name of Lord Lyndhurst leads me to observe that the country owes about as much gratitude for what of good has been done with regard to this question to one party as to the other; and the fact that it was Mr. Napier, so well known in connection with Lord Derby's Irish Administration, who took the next step, and moved for the Commission of 1854, further illustrates that observation. The Commission of 1854 echoed to a great extent the recommendations of the Committee of 1846, and, above all, brought into strong relief the point on which I wish chiefly to fix the attention of the House—that no one should be called to the bar who has not gone through some systematic training in the theory as well as the practice of law, and passed a satisfactory examination. This is a question with regard to which the opinions of very few individual Members are of much value, and what I want to impress upon the House is, not that the dominant party in the Inns of Court has opposed itself to what seemed to me, or to others, to be sound principles, but that they have put themselves in opposition to a perfectly overwhelming weight of legal authority. Of course no one considers that a compulsory examination, taken by itself, is a matter of very extraordinary importance; but it is of extraordinary importance as being the indispensable complement of the whole system of legal education proposed by the Committee and Commission. Without it that system cannot possibly be worked, and must remain all but a dead letter. I have said that I wish to put the question chiefly on the ground of authority. Still I wish to state, in a few words, the arguments which seem to my mind to be decisive. I can understand free trade in law; I can understand the bar being a monopoly; but our present system combines all the disadvantages of free trade and of monopoly. It is a monopoly for the advantage of the barrister, without any better guarantee for the public than would be obtained if any one who pleased might exercise the profession of advocacy. We have, it cannot be sufficiently often repeated, no real guarantee at this moment for the competency of a barrister. Let us see how the system works with regard to the three classes into which the members of the bar may be divided—those, namely, who go to the bar with a view to practice; those who are called chiefly with a view to the various appointments which are by law or custom confined to members of the bar; and those who are merely nominal barristers. With respect to the first of these classes, it may be said that the fact of their being in practice is of itself a sufficient guarantee. Well, supposing I were to admit that it is a sufficient guarantee for their being up to the requirements of ordinary business, it will not be contended that there exists any guarantee for their having the enlargement of mind which is necessary when they come to the higher walks of the profession—when they come to be Judges or law-makers. Is it not perfectly notorious that men who succeed sufficiently well as practitioners often fail egregiously in these other capacities? Have not Judges often been the worst enemies of law reforms, and do not the pages of the evidence taken before the Committee of 1846 and the Commission of 1854 afford abundant proofs that the truth of what I am now saying is generally acknowledged? With respect to the second class, you have not even the guarantee of practice. Read Lord Brougham's evidence before the Committee of 1846, and you will see how difficult he found it to put his hand upon men who had been fitted by systematic training to undertake the duties of Colonial Judges. Read Mr. Norton's very interesting evidence in the same blue-book, and you will see in how very difficult a position is a Judge who, knowing only a little English law, and having had no scientific training in jurisprudence, is suddenly sent to a colony. I think, Sir, we hardly realize how important a question this is in relation to the management of our colonies. If ever there were lawyers who ought to be grounded in the general principles of jurisprudence, which underlie all laws, it should surely be the lawyers of England. A few remarkable sentences, which I shall ask leave to read to the House, will bring this before it in a way far more vivid than I can do. They were written some time ago, but matters have not much altered since, and English barristers have still to deal either as Colonial Judges or as practitioners before the Privy Council with the widely distinct systems to which I am going to allude:—

“At this moment there are few of the systems of legislation, either of ancient or modern times, which are not in force as living law in the British Empire—Menu and Mohammed, beside the civil rights of the Hindoo and the Mussulman, and an appeal from India compels our Privy Councillors to consult the Koran and the Puranas as authorities at Whitehall. In the Norman Isles, the severed portions of the domain of the Conqueror, the barbaric customal framed by his justiciars still guides the grand bailiff and the seneschal who dispense the equity of Rollo, now forgotten, in the hall of Rouen. Canada cherishes the volumes which have been cast forth from the Palais de Justice, and the legitimate representatives of the proud and learned Presidents of the Parliament of Paris are found in the court-house of a colonial town. Banished from the flowering meadows of the Seine, the ordonnances expounded by St. Louis, under the oak tree at Vincennes, constitute the tenures of land on the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In the opposite hemisphere, we bestow an equal protection upon the Codes of Napoleon. Our Sovereign appoints her alcaldes and her corregidores in the Indies of Columbus, while her landrosts in Southern Africa are guided by the placets of the departed Republic of the Netherlands.”

It is enough to have spoken of Colonial Judges. I pass over a host of other appointments, in the nomination to which favour or political interest has much to do. I come, then, to the third class, a very large one, that of nominal barristers. It is a class which has numerous representatives on the magisterial bench, numerous representatives in this House, numerous representatives in general society; and for the interest of this class, and of all connected with it, it is above all desirable that there should be some systematic training, and an effective examination, otherwise their attaining the degree of barrister is a mere useless form, without advantage to themselves, and of serious detriment to all who, on the strength of it, conclude that they have necessarily any tincture whatsoever of legal learning. There are many other arguments: one might point to the absurdity of examining candidates for the line of the army, and not examining candidates for the one profession which gives in this House the title of learned. One might point to the void in the shelves of an English library where works on jurisprudence should be, and where Bentham, Austin, Maine, and the younger Stephen look wistfully around for companions. One might ask how long are we to wait for that great blessing, a codified law, if we do not begin to train lawyers, who will be inclined to work, or able to work a code. All these, however, and many more, with which I will not weary the House, are set forth in the blue-book which records the labours of this Commission, and by it, as by the Committee of 1846, a compulsory examination is pronounced indispensable. Such, then, being the recommendations of the Select Committee and of the Royal Commission, backed by those of our greatest legal luminaries, what have the Inns of Court done? Have they adopted them? Have they instituted a systematic training, followed by a compulsory examination? Far from it. The history of their action in this matter is as follows:—In 1856, the Council of Legal Education met, and reported unanimously in favour of compulsory examination. They supported their recommendation by a document signed by all the readers, and supporting the same views without the slightest reservation. In May 1859, the Committee of the Four Inns appointed to reconsider the whole subject of Legal Education made their Report, and insisted in the strongest terms on the necessity of a compulsory examination, and proposed that it should embrace precisely the same subjects which were suggested by the Royal Commission. This report is signed by the present Lord Chancellor, and marks the period of greatest advance in the history of this question. But now a change came. Lincoln's Inn took upon itself to oppose the recommendations of the committee appointed by the Four Inns, and passed, by a majority of its members, in November, 1859, resolutions condemnatory of the proposed compulsory examination. Somewhat later they declared open war with the two Templars, and on the 4th of July, 1860, a committee of Lincoln's Inn made a report which contemplated the establishment of a system of education distinct from theirs, the great cause of quarrel being, of course, the compulsory examination. Then followed negotiations, the result of which was that Lincoln's Inn carried its point, and succeeded in persuading the other Inns, against their own better judgment, to be parties to the issuing of the consolidated regulations, by which the students of these societies are now governed, dated Michaelmas, 1863. In them I find many good things and several improvements; but I also find a heavy blow and great discouragement to the cause which I advocate, in the fact that, under these regulations, a student of the Inns of Court is now qualified to be called to the bar if he has attended lectures and private classes of two of the readers for a year, or if he has spent a year in chambers, without having passed an examination. We all can imagine, and many of us know from experience, that the mere obligations of attending a year's lectures does not imply the acquisition of any knowledge whatsoever, and that a large number of the students occupy themselves with matters quite alien to those about which the reader desires to interest them. In short, they look upon the obligation to attend lectures, not as a means of acquiring legal knowledge, but as a sort of corvée, which it is their right to evade in every possible way. Again, many of us have passed a year in chambers, and we know that doing so may imply very great assiduity, absolute idleness, or anything between these two extremes. On the other hand, an examination, which is even decently conducted, at least guarantees some modicum of knowledge and power of application in the candidate for admission to the bar. I bring this subject forward in the most friendly spirit to the governing bodies of the Inns of Court, but my respect for them does not prevent my calling upon them to set forth, for the information of the public, those strong reasons of principle and expediency which have induced them to disregard, in a most essential point, the unanimous recommendation of a Select Committee, the unanimous recommendation of a Royal Commission, the unanimous recommendation of the Council of Legal Education, the unanimous recommendation of all the readers of all the Inns of Court, the opinions of Lord Brougham, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Westbury, backed by those of eminent lawyers too numerous to mention. In May, 1856, and again in May, 1857, the Report of the Commission was alluded to in this House. It has not, I think, been mentioned since. On the latter occasion, the Attorney General of that day more than hinted that, if the Inns of Court would not carry out the views of the Commission, the Government would be obliged to do so. I do not ask the Government to take any action now. I had infinitely rather that reform came from within, but, if it does not, I beg to give notice that I will next year bring forward this Motion in another form.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

"an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Copy of any Correspondence that may have passed between the Government and the Inns of Court, with regard to the Report of the Commission on the Inns of Court,"—(Mr. Grant Duff.)

—instead thereof.

Motion made and Question proposed,
"That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. NEATE said, that the difficulty of dealing with the Inns of Court was that they claimed to be associations of private individuals, and repudiated all responsibility. They denied that there was any process for compelling them to discharge their duties. In fact, they might be described as squatters upon the legal constitution. They had acquired title by prescription. He had the honour of being a member of one of the Inns of Court, and he had had a good deal of correspondence with them. When a man had once become a member of one of the Inns of Court, it would not allow him to withdraw without requiring him to enter into an obligation which it had no right to impose. Now, if a man wished to renounce his privileges in an University he had only to write to the bursar of his college to take his name off; but a man was not allowed to retire from an Inn of Court without entering into a covenant that he would not practise anywhere as a barrister.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he understood the hon. Member who had brought forward the question not to make any attack upon the Inns of Court, but only to complain that they had not carried out the recommendation of the Royal Commission, that a candidate for the bar should pass a preliminary examination before being admitted. He would remind him that with respect to that question a good deal could be said on both sides. He confessed that his own inclination was in favour of compulsory examination; but there were reasons which influenced the benchers in arriving at a different conclusion, and which were still to a great extent under consideration. It should be borne in mind that all who were called to the bar were not necessarily practitioners, or persons who intended to practise. Many only intended to qualify themselves for performing their duties as magistrates, or as chairmen of Quarter Sessions. He might instance many Members of that House, among whom were some of its greatest ornaments, who were called to the bar but never intended to practise. It had been considered by the Inns of Court that if they imposed a strict examination, such as the hon. Member required, it might have the effect of deterring such persons from becoming candidates for admission to the bar, and would therefore be prejudicial not only to the bar but to the public. As the hon. Member said, that if the Government did not take up the question he would bring it forward again, probably the most convenient time for discussing it would be on that future occasion. He (the Solicitor General) could only say further, that it did not appear to him that the Government were called upon at present to take any steps in the matter. He believed that the Inns of Court thoroughly represented and had the full confidence of the profession. If the Inns of Court did not fairly represent the bar, nor conduct themselves to the satisfaction of the great body of the profession, they would have heard complaints from the profession, but he was not aware of any such complaints having been made. With regard to the complaint of the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), he believed that it was unfounded. He understood the case to be this—if a barrister wished to take his name off the books of his Inn, it was necessary that he should undertake that he would not practise at all as a barrister, and for that purpose they took from him some security. The Government would be willing to produce any papers in their possession on the subject if the hon. Member would indicate them; but he hoped he would be satisfied with his explanation and not press his Motion.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. COX rose to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the terms of a Resolution of the Select Committee on Royal Forests in Essex which sat in the Session of 1863. It might be in the recollection of the House that in February, 1863, it was agreed to present an Address to Her Majesty praying that Crown forestal right existing within fifteen miles of the metropolis should not be disposed of, nor encroachments thereon be permitted. The encroachments which had been going on were, however, continued; the public paid no attention to the rights of the Crown,

The Solicitor General

and the Government paid no attention to the Vote of the House. A Committee was afterwards appointed to inquire into the subject, and by it a most elaborate Report was presented to the House. The Members of the Committee, of whom he was one, were nearly equally divided in opinion. The minority, in which also he was included, thought it better to leave the whole thing as it was; the majority, on the other hand, were in favour of enclosing certain parts of the land which had not before been used by the public, and of retaining portions which it was proved they had been in the habit of enjoying. He now admitted that he had changed his view; and, together with another hon. Member of the Committee who was one of the minority, had come to the conclusion that the majority was right. It might be objected that no inclosure at all should be made; but though that was his former opinion he did not now go to that extent. He thought, however, that unless something were done soon to preserve a portion of the forest in question to the public there would be no forest left, and not only would the Crown lose its right but the public be deprived of the privilege they had long enjoyed. One of the Resolutions of the Committee to which he had referred was to the effect, that a considerable part of the forest having been enclosed without consideration of Crown rights, the Crown be recommended to take immediate steps to ascertain its rights and to abate such inclosures. As yet, however, as was admitted recently by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, no steps had been taken by the Government to carry the Resolution of the Committee into effect, or to prevent any further enclosures taking place. The Committee further recommended that the sanction of Parliament should be obtained "For the inclosure of the remaining portion of the forest, to ascertain the rights of the several parties interested, and to make provision for securing an adequate portion of the forest for the purposes of health and recreation, for which, it has been proved to your Committee, this forest has from time immemorial been enjoyed by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood and the metropolis."

It would be said, perhaps, by the Government, where was the money to come from with which to carry the recommendation into effect? He would tell the Government in reply that the Crown held 2,000 acres, which had been taken out of the forest, and which were worth £100 an acre, and to those the public had some claim.

This would be seen from the fact that Fairlop Oak was situated, and Fairlop Fair was accustomed to be held, on the very spot in possession of the Government, and from which land the Government were deriving a revenue of £4,000 or £5,000 a year. The public by usage had a right to the portion of the forest referred to, and as this portion was worth at least £200,000, the Government could not say they had not the funds with which to carry out the recommendations of the Committee. Further, after paying the expenses of draining and fencing, this land yielded a profit of £15,000 on the sale of the timber. He therefore called on the Government to stop the encroachments that were being made on the forest, and to carry into effect the recommendations of the Committee. In conclusion, he begged to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, Her Majesty's Government should at once take the necessary steps to carry into effect the Recommendation of the Select Committee on Royal Forests (Essex) in Session, 1863, and which Recommendation was as follows: ‘To obtain the sanction of Parliament for the inclosure of the remaining portion of the forest; to ascertain the rights of the several parties interested; and to make provision for securing an adequate portion of the forest for those purposes of health and recreation for which, it has been proved to your Committee, this forest has from time immemorial been enjoyed by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood and the metropolis.’”

MR. SPEAKER: The House having already resolved “that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,” it is not competent for the hon. Member to move any further Amendment to the Motion that I do leave the Chair.

MR. PEELE said, that the hon. Member, in complaining of the Government for not carrying out the Recommendations of the Committee, had not made allowance for the difficulties in which they were placed; but if the course they had adopted had not been satisfactory to the hon. Member, it had satisfied the House. In February last year the House voted an Address to the Crown, praying it to give directions that no sale to facilitate inclosures should be made of Crown lands or forestal rights within fifteen miles of the metropolis. The recommendation of the Select Committee, however, was that the lands should be inclosed, and that the rights of the Crown in Epping Forest, which were merely those of keeping and hunting deer over open spaces, but which prevented inclosure as long as it remained, should be sold. In this conflict between the Report of the Committee and the Resolution of the House, the Government had felt it their duty to follow the latter as long as it continued unrescinded. The Address to the Crown had been agreed to, he must remark, rather in opposition to the opinion of the Government, who thought that it was scarcely fitting that the forestal right of the Crown over Epping Forest, the soil of which was private property, should be used as an instrument for converting that private property into public property; and they were advised by the Law Officers that it would be very difficult to institute successful legal proceedings for the purpose of abating bit by bit encroachments over a considerable space. Moreover, they had also doubted whether it would not be subversive of the principle of the Acts relating to the land revenues of the Crown, that a large expenditure should be incurred in asserting rights which, when vindicated, would be productive of no income to the Crown. The Committee of last Session in their Report recognized the force of the objections made by the Government, and expressed an opinion that to employ the forestal rights of the Crown to obstruct the process of inclosure would not only be a course doubtful in point of justice, but one which, judging from the experience of the past, was likely to fail in securing the desired object. He was inclined to think it would be advisable that some Resolution, such as that which the hon. Member had wished to move, should be adopted by the House; but he took exception to the words stating that Her Majesty's Government ought at once to take the necessary steps for carrying out the recommendation of the Committee of last year. It would not be in the power of the Government to do that. The question was not one merely as to disposing of the forestal rights of the Crown. If that were all, they could, no doubt, either sell those rights to the owners of the soil or obtain in exchange for them some equitable equivalent for the benefit of the public. But the Committee recommended that open spaces in the forest should be inclosed, subject to the reservation and acquisition of an adequate portion for the health and recreation of the inhabitants of the metropolis. As the law now stood, it rested with the owners and others interested in these open spaces to originate the proceedings for inclosure, and the Government had no compulsory power to require any open space to be inclosed.

It was a difficult question, too, from what source the means of purchase should be derived. The hon. Member had endeavoured to dispose of that difficult question by saying that the Government could, without coming to that House, appropriate 2,000 acres to the purpose of a public park in Epping Forest. The £200,000 which the hon. Member said was the value of the Crown property in Epping Forest, was however as much portion of the landed revenue of the Crown as any other, and the Crown had no power to divert that amount to the purposes contemplated. It was very undesirable that the House should commit itself indirectly or by implication to the making of any grant for the acquisition of that portion of the forest which it was desired to procure. The question was actually under discussion between the Treasury and the Metropolitan Board at the present moment, and a letter had been written to that Board from which, as it had been already moved for, he might be permitted to read the following extract:—

"Their Lordships are even more unable to act upon the second alternative proposed by the Committee" (that now recommended by the hon. Member). "Parliament, by the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 42, which separated the Departments of Woods and Forests and Land Revenues and of the Commissioners of Public Works, assigned certain Royal Parks in the neighbourhood of London to the management of the latter department, in order that they might be maintained principally for the recreation of the inhabitants of the metropolis, and left all other portions of the landed property of the Crown under the management of the Commissioners of Woods, in order that during Her Majesty's reign the revenues should be administered for the benefit of the Exchequer. By this Act Parliament decided the extent to which the recreation of the inhabitants should be provided for from public funds, and, it may be added, that it has very liberally provided by annual Votes for the maintenance and embellishment of the metropolitan parks and gardens. Not only, however, does the Act of 1851 define the extent to which public aid should be afforded for this, but the enactment above quoted clearly throws upon the Metropolitan Board the duty of providing any additions to the public parks which circumstances may require. My Lords, therefore, before they decide upon any further proceedings on this subject, wish to ascertain whether the Metropolitan Board is disposed to take any measures for obtaining Parliamentary powers for the inclosure of Epping Forest as a place of recreation under the authority of the enactment in question (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 144, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112, s. 10). If they should be disposed to do so, my Lords will be prepared to consider any arrangements for the cession of the rights of the Crown which may be necessary for effecting the objects in view. Two courses presented themselves to the Committee as applicable to the remaining portion of Waltham Forest—one is to discontinue the sale of the forestal rights of the Crown, vigilantly to maintain these rights without regard to the question of cost, for the purpose of preventing all future inclosures, and to preserve the forest in its present extent and wild uninclosed condition. Your Committee are of opinion that to employ the forestal rights of the Crown for the purpose of obstructing that process of inclosure to which the Lords (Commons?) and copyholders of the manors comprised within the forest are entitled, in common with all other persons similarly situated, would not only be a course of doubtful justice, but might in accordance with the experience of the past fail in securing the desired object."

A reply had been received from the Metropolitan Board, asking for further information before deciding upon the proposition made to them; and therefore he was not in a position to state what course the Government might decide upon taking, with a view to carry out the suggestion of the Committee as to setting aside an adequate portion of Epping Forest. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with this explanation.

MR. PEACOCKE preferred wild forests to tame parks, and would rather see Epping Forest kept in its present wild state by asserting the forestal rights of the Crown than that portions of it should be inclosed in the manner proposed. It was far more enjoyable for residents in the neighbourhood, and for visitors from London in its existing condition; while, as a question of economy, the 7,000 acres still uninclosed could be purchased for £30,000, and at least £70,000 or £80,000 would be required to lay down 100 or 150 acres, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman said it would be an expensive process to act upon the Crown forestal rights and to abate inclosures; but this he looked on as a frivolous excuse. Did the right hon. Gentleman imagine that no corresponding expense would be entailed upon the encroachers, or that any person would like to engage in a lawsuit with the Crown? Moreover, if the Crown were successful in one suit there need be no apprehension that other suits would follow. The inclosures going on at the present moment, he believed, were taking place upon grounds over which the Crown had parted with its forestal rights. In such cases the power of the House no longer existed; but the hon. Gentleman who had brought forward this subject was bound, he thought, to give some evidence in support of his views, and likewise to account for his own change of opinion.

Mr. Peel

The present position of the question was most unsatisfactory, and he hoped the hon. Member for Lambeth, who carried a Motion with regard to it a few evenings ago, would at the commencement of next Session move for a Committee to inquire into the whole subject of open spaces, with which might be advantageously coupled a further inquiry into the general working of the Inclosure Act.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was virtually the author of the Select Committee — [MR. PEACOCKE: No] — having carried a Resolution preventing the sale of forestal rights over Epping Forest. He (Sir John Trollope) had been appointed a member of that Committee, and he was bound to say that the interest of the Crown, and the consequent protection which it was calculated to afford, seemed in this case to be almost infinitesimal, extending as it did only to the right of keeping deer in the forest and consequently to herbage for them. The real question was as to the persons in whom the right to the soil was vested. The real right to the soil was vested in these, and if they could agree to go to the Inclosure Commissioners, under the General Act, they could at once obtain an inclosure, and the rights of the Crown would be preserved by a small allotment; but it was the lords of the soil, the commoners, and the copyholders who were the proper persons to stir in the matter. They had nothing whatever to do with the public. The public might squat upon it, or live the life of gipsies upon it, but they had no right to interfere with its ultimate appropriation. The Committee recommended larger allotments for purposes of public recreation and enjoyment than the Inclosure Commissioners had the power to award. They recommended that from 150 to 200 acres, not lying altogether, but separated by intervals of space, should be allotted to the public in this manner. There was a great difficulty in dealing with Epping Forest in that respect. If, for example, a larger allotment was set out than usual, it must be vested in some body which would improve it and keep it in proper condition. This was what ought to have been done in Chigwell. There fifty acres were appropriated to the public that were neither drained, levelled, nor inclosed; no monies were provided for those purposes; they were useless for recreation, and, unless they were placed under the care of the Board of Works or the Metropolitan Board, it would be impossible to make this land useful for the public at large. As he took a somewhat utilitarian view of this subject, he could not agree with his hon. Friend (Mr. Peacocke) as to the value of the land in its present wild and unimproved condition. It was covered with brushwood, with tangled briars and thorns, and nineteenth-twentieths of it was useless except to feed a few scrubby cattle and miserable ponies. It was a disgrace to our civilization that within fifteen miles of the metropolis 7,000 acres of land should be allowed to remain in such a state when it might so easily be turned to some useful account. Let any one visit the forest in unfavourable weather and the result would be that he would leave his upper garments on the bushes and his shoes in the mud. The Committee took the practical view of this subject, and the hon. Member for Maldon the poetical and sentimental. He (Sir John Trollope) introduced a clause in the Report, which was, however, negatived, giving to the Government Department the credit he thought it deserved for the improvements it had made in Hainault Forest, which now produced £4,000 a year, whereas formerly the same land scarcely produced barely £500. If a similar improvement were made in Epping Forest it would be conducive to the public interest as well as to private advantage.

MR. DOULTON said that, having regard to the Resolution come to the other evening respecting open spaces, the proper plan would be to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject, and the present matter would then properly form part of the inquiry, and he should move early next Session for such a Committee. His object was to preserve the forest in its wild and uncultivated condition, because that formed its greatest attraction in the eyes of those for whom it was desirable the forest should be preserved. If the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury had gone to a division, he should certainly have voted against it, not only because it was antagonistic to the vote of the other evening, but on account of the expense of laying out this park, and also the annual cost of the maintenance of a park of 7,000 acres. The proper course was to refer the matter to a Select Committee, to investigate not only the open spaces and commons in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, but also the state of Epping and other forests. The rights of the Crown in regard to Epping Forest were very small, it was true; but if the Crown would only retain the rights it possessed, that would be the best guarantee that the forest would be preserved in its present state for the inhabitants of the metropolis. He would remind the hon. Member that no one was more energetic than he in opposition to the expenditure on Kennington Park, which was infinitely small in comparison with that which the hon. Member now proposed to lay out in connection with Epping Forest.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

EARL RUSSELL & THE CONFERENCE.

LORD BURGHLEY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can explain the statement which appeared in The Times of Tuesday, the 28th of June, to the effect that the President of the Council of the Lower House of the Rigsraad, in answer to a question upon the Conference, made the following reply?—

"The Danish Plenipotentiaries were instructed to accept the line of demarcation of the Schlei, and to agree to a fortnight's prolongation of the armistice should England firmly adhere to that line. Earl Russell promised that neither would he make a proposal himself, nor support the proposal of any other Plenipotentiary which would be less favourable to Denmark, unless Denmark herself should consent to such new proposals. Earl Russell nevertheless proposed, in the sitting of the Conference on the 18th, that the question should be submitted to arbitration, although Denmark did not consent to this proposal."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, there is no inconsistency in the assurance of my noble Friend and the course which he took. The statement is not absolutely correct. It is very easy to substitute one word for another, and so to alter the meaning. My noble Friend did not say he would make no proposal. What he stated was, that if the Danes would agree to the line of the Schlei, he would not himself propose any other line, or support any other line if it was proposed by any other Power; and to that engagement he adhered. But when, at last, it was found that the Danes would not consent to any line north of the Schlei, and that the Germans would not consent to any line south of Apenrade, it then became necessary either to give up the whole thing in despair, or to make the proposal which, in concert with the other neutral Powers, my noble Friend made—not for another line, but that an arbiter should be appointed to whom should be referred the question pending between the parties. That arbiter might have determined on the line of the Schlei, or the line of the Apenrade, or he might have determined on some other line. But, unless my noble Friend had been prepared to abdicate his functions, it was impossible for him to say that he would make no other proposal with a view to a peaceful settlement of the matters in dispute. I may take advantage of this Question to explain another misunderstanding which has arisen. My noble Friend stated in another place the other day that henceforward no trust could be reposed in the German Powers. That statement, I know, has hurt the feelings of the persons concerned, and has been interpreted in a way not intended by my noble Friend. He by no means intended to say that any assertion and any declaration of the German Powers was not trustworthy, inasmuch as it was not given truthfully or with a sincere intention; but what he meant—as, indeed, the context of his statement clearly shows—was that the German Powers have upon more than one occasion been driven from their original intention by a pressure which they were unable to resist, and that, therefore, you could not be sure that any intention, however sincerely and truthfully stated at the time, was one that the German Powers would be able to maintain against the pressure which might be brought to bear against them. That was my noble Friend's meaning: and he, like myself, is very sorry that the words spoken should have been interpreted in a different sense, and should have given pain to parties for whom my noble Friend and the Government are naturally disposed to show the greatest possible consideration and respect.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Did I understand the noble Lord to say that the line of the Schlei and Dannewerke was the line proposed by Earl Russell and supported by the neutral Powers?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Yes; that appears on the Protocols.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £3,750, Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

MR. HADFIELD said, the Ecclesiastical Commission ought to be able to pay all expenses out of their own funds, and the Vote was objectionable.

MR. PEEL said, when that portion of the business of the Commissioners which arose under the Church Building Acts was transferred to their management by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 55, Parliament decided to provide the means for paying the expenses which should be incurred under the Act, and the Commissioners had no power to pay such expenses except out of money voted by Parliament.

MR. W. WILLIAMS also objected to the Vote, and said he should support his hon. Friend if he went to a division.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the opposition to the Vote showed how inconvenient it was that the Church Building Acts had not been consolidated. If that had been done, the charge in question might have been removed.

MR. HADFIELD said, the objection to the consolidation was that the new parish churches should be thrown upon a church rate.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £11,224, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.

In reply to Colonel FRENCH,

MR. PEEL stated, that the item for English and Irish Law Courts was to pay the expense incidental to the Commission appointed to consider the expediency of assimilating the practice and procedure of the Irish Law Courts to those of the English Law Courts.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £22,689, to complete the sum for Patent Law Expenses.

(4.) £11,152, to complete the sum for Fishery Board, Scotland.

(5.) £2,000, Trustees of Manufactures, Scotland.

(8.) £500, Boundary Survey, Ireland.

(9.) £680, Malta and Alexandria Telegraph, &c.

MR. PEEL, in reply to Mr. TORRENS, said, that the working of the Malta and Alexandria line had been twice interrupted, once in last year and again in the present year; but the cable had been repaired, and the line was now in good working order, and was realizing large receipts at the present time.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the item of £982 constituted a large expenditure for the repairs and inclosure of the British burial ground at Varna. With regard to the sum of £315 10s. 6d. for Mr. J. Morrin, of the Rolls Office, Dublin, for extra duties and expenses in connection with editing and publishing the first two volumes of the Calendar of Patent and Close Rolls in Ireland, there were certain people, himself among the number, who disputed the capability of Mr. Morrin for the work. A great many errors had been detected in the work in question.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that £552 was to be paid for fees connected with the installation of Prince Alfred as a Knight of the Garter. That was not, in his opinion, a charge which ought to fall on the public purse.

MR. PEEL said, the condition of the cemetery at Varna was such that it had become necessary to go to some expense for an inclosure. As to the case of Mr. Morrin, he was aware that charges of inaccuracy had been brought against his work; but it was not a question on which the Treasury could form an opinion of their own. It had been arranged that the Master of the Rolls in England should appoint two competent persons to inquire into the matter.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE asked for information as to when and where the outlay for the inspection of sheep, with a view to the prevention of disease, had been incurred, and whether the persons employed were duly qualified.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that two years ago the prevalence of small pox in sheep excited great alarm in certain districts of England, and the Government appointed two most experienced and competent gentlemen, Professor Simonds and Dr. Marsden, to inquire into the matter.

COLONEL FRENCH, in reference to the charge for an inspection of the drainage works on the banks of the Shannon, said, he wished to ask a question on the subject. The Shannon Commissioners had spent a sum of £300,000 in deepening the Shannon. On the ground that the works executed by that Commission were to effect great improvements in the Shannon districts, the land in the vicinity had been taxed for the entire cost. The work was entirely a Government one; but its effect had been to increase the inundations, and so do positive injury to the properties of those who were made to pay for it. He wished to know what was the intention of the Government with reference to the matter, now that they were in possession of the Report of Mr. Bateman, the engineer who had recently been appointed to inspect the works.

MR. PEEL said, that a number of gentlemen in the West of Ireland having represented to the Government that the inundations had been increased by the works executed by the Shannon Commissioners, the Treasury, though they did not concur in that view, agreed to appoint Mr. Bateman, the eminent engineer, to inspect and report upon the works. Mr. Bateman's expenses were to be paid by the Government; but there was a distinct understanding with the gentlemen at whose request the inspection had been made, that any works which Mr. Bateman might recommend should be undertaken by the landed proprietors at their own cost. The Report of Mr. Bateman, which was an able one, bore out the view which all along had been taken by the Treasury, and showed that the works executed by the Shannon Commissioners, so far from having aggravated had mitigated the evils complained of. Mr. Bateman had recommended additional works, which would cost £250,000; but he had not heard what steps the local gentry had taken to have those works executed.

COLONEL FRENCH said, the agreement between the proprietors and the Treasury was that the former should pay for any improvements which Mr. Bateman might recommend, and which had not been included in the works which the Shannon Commissioners had been appointed to carry out; but it had never been intended by the proprietors that they should pay over again for what the Shannon Commissioners were bound by their contract to perform.

THAMES EMBANKMENT AND METROPOLIS IMPROVEMENT (LOANS).

COMMITTEE.

Resolutions considered in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the following Resolutions:—

"That it is expedient to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to guarantee the repayment of any money that may be borrowed under the Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement Acts, together with the interest thereon; and to cause advances to be made out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of such sums as may be necessary for the repayment of such principal and interest, in aid of any other moneys applicable for that purpose under the said Act.

"That the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt be authorized to advance the money which, by the Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement Acts, the Metropolitan Board of Works is authorized to raise."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

The Resolutions were strictly limited to the objects expressed—they were purely financial, and he was not about to ask the Committee to sanction any new expenditure or undertake any new works. The Legislature had by Act of Parliament provided for the outlay of certain sums upon the embankment of the Thames, and the question now was how the money was to be raised. The Metropolitan Board of Works had power to raise money, and found that they could raise it at the rate of 4½ per cent; but when they raised a greater sum a short time ago for executing the main drainage works they obtained the guarantee of the Government, and by means of it were able to borrow from the Bank of England at the rate of £3 15s. per cent. They were of opinion that they had a claim upon the Government for similar assistance in regard to the embankment of the Thames and the improvement of the metropolis in connection with it. What they said was that of late years the metropolis had been called upon to undertake very heavy burdens, although until recently it had not possessed any local resources beyond the coal and wine dues, and that it contained a great mass of Government property which made no contribution to its improvement. He might add, on his own part, that the whole charge of metropolitan improvements, though those improvements were of the most permanent character, was laid upon the temporary and fugitive occupiers of the metropolis. The consumers in the metropolis paid in the shape of coal and wine dues, and the ratepayers sustained a very heavy charge, but those who had the greatest and most permanent interest in the improvement of the metropolis—namely, the ground landowners, did not pay a single farthing. He mentioned that, not for the purpose of proposing any change, but to illustrate the position in which the Metropolitan Board of Works found themselves placed. On receiving the application of the Board for a Government guarantee, he took means to satisfy himself of the sufficiency of their resources; but the question arose whether they should be limited to the Bank of England, or whether they might not be permitted to ask advances from the National Debt Commissioners. As a general rule the Commissioners invested in whatever was guaranteed by Parliament, and, being satisfied that the present was a case in which the guarantee of Parliament should be given, he thought it would be proper to take power to make advances to the Metropolitan Board from the funds at the command of the Commissioners. Such would be the object of the Bill which he was about to introduce, and he had only to add that plenty of time would be given for the consideration of the measure before the second reading. In addition to the security of the coal and wine dues, there would be the collateral security of the rates of the metropolis; and there was no doubt that between the Bank of England and the National Debt Commissioners the Metropolitan Board of Works would get all the money they required for this undertaking, or about £2,500,000.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked, Whether there was any provision made for the contingency of the Thames Embankment costing far more than was contemplated by the Metropolitan Board of Works. In that event, how would they raise the additional sum required?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER apprehended that they must come to Parliament.

In reply to a question from Mr. WILLIAMS,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent was the rate of interest at which the Metropolitan Board of Works would be able to borrow without the guarantee of the Government. With that guarantee they could borrow from the Bank of England at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he could not of course give a decided opinion on the scheme without seeing the Bill; but he thought the Metropolitan Board had a fair claim to the assistance that could properly be afforded to them by the Government. It was now proposed that the Government should afford them an amount of indirect financial assistance. Since the establishment of that Board it had conducted the business intrusted to it in a manner that justified the confidence which the inhabitants of the metropolis were now prepared to repose in it, and he thought the plan proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer beneficial.

MR. T. J. MILLER said, the great value of that measure was, that it would save the metropolis the difference between $4\frac{1}{2}$ and $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest on the money raised for this work. It was a matter of comparative indifference to the Metropolitan Board of Works, whether the money was raised at $4\frac{1}{2}$ or $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; but the great object which that Board had in view was to effect the greatest amount of improvement in the metropolis at the smallest expense to the inhabitants generally. There could be no doubt as to the security for the repayment of the loan.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he could not admit that it was a matter of indifference to the Metropolitan Board of Works whether they raised this money at $4\frac{1}{2}$ or $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and that it would only affect the ratepayers. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite) the other day stated before the Committee on Subways that the rates of the Metropolitan Board of Works had reached their utmost legal limit, and consequently the Board could lay no heavier rates on the metropolis. It had also reached its utmost legal limit in borrowing. But by the present measure it would obtain a larger sum than it otherwise could do for carrying on certain works. The boon granted by the Bill would be a boon entirely to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and not one to the metropolis at all; and unless the House were satisfied that the money would be wisely expended, and that those persons would obtain the contracts who sent in the lowest tenders, he did not think that additional powers ought to be given to that Board.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the House need not then concern itself with the question, whether the tenders were properly taken or the estimates sound? Their security was based first on the wine and coal dues, and, secepdly, not merely on the present rating powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works, but also on the new rating powers which the Bill about to be introduced would give to the Board.

MR. KINNAIRD asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman would not take some step for carrying out his own most fair suggestion—that the taxation for these improvements should be shared by those who would permanently benefit by them?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the time had not come when a proposal of that kind should be made.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS maintained that, as this measure would enlarge the borrowing powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the Government ought to take care that the money was likely to be wisely and economically applied.

(1.) Resolved,

That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to guarantee the repayment of any money that may be borrowed under the Thames Embankment and Metropolitan Improvement Acts, together with the interest thereon; and to cause advances to be made out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of such sums as may be necessary for the repayment of such principal and interest, in aid of any other moneys applicable for that purpose under the said Act.

(2.) Resolved,

That the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt be authorized to advance the money which by the Thames Embankment and Metropolitan Improvement Acts the Metropolitan Board of Works is authorized to raise.

INDEMNITY BILL—[BILL 97.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HADFIELD said, he had an Amendment to propose. The Bill itself, which, contrary to usual practice, had been circulated among Members, was a perfect curiosity. It recited no less than twelve Acts of Parliament, most, if not all of which, he believed, had been repealed by subsequent Acts of Parliament. Among them was the 25th of Charles II.,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

which required an oath against Transubstantiation. Another required a declaration that the signer would upon no pretence take up arms against the King; and yet in 1688 all classes took up arms to get rid of a tyrant. There was a declaration against the oath called the Solemn League, and an Act of the 30th of Charles II. disabled Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament. Another Act extorted an oath not to injure the Church. He would, therefore, beg to move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "considering the long period during which yearly Indemnity Bills have passed, on account of the non-compliance with the requirements of Acts of Parliament made and passed in times of political excitement and trouble (some of them two hundred years ago), imposing oaths and declarations as stated in the Indemnity Bill, a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report first of all whether a complete and effectual Indemnity can be given by Parliament for all omissions to the present time; and, in the next place, whether the time has not arrived to repeal so many of the said requirements as are useless and no longer required for the present times,"—(Mr. Hadfield)

—instead thereof.

MR. PEEL said, that whatever objections might be offered to the oaths and declarations to which the hon. Member referred, there was nothing antiquated in the present declarations. As far as he knew, there was no declaration at present in force of an earlier date than 1828, when the old declaration against Transubstantiation was repealed, and another form of declaration enacted instead. In the same manner the old oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration were repealed in 1858, and a short oath appointed in lieu of them. The mistake which the hon. Member made was in supposing that because those oaths and declarations were repealed, therefore the original Acts imposing them were also repealed. That was not so; the Acts remained in force, and they had to be read as if they contained the new form of declaration or oath. He very much agreed with the hon. Member in his desire to see the repeal of the Acts themselves; he did not believe that any of the security which the Church or State had enjoyed during the last 100 years was derived from their existence on the statute-book. He, however, could not understand why the hon. Member proposed an Amendment to this Bill, because it took the same direction as the hon. Gentleman desired to go, the only difference being that it did yearly what the hon. Member desired to see done once and for all. If the Committee were appointed, it would be impossible to pass the Indemnity Bill this Session, and great inconvenience would result from the old Acts being revived. He suggested that if the hon. Member thought it better to proceed by way of Committee than by a Bill, as he had hitherto done, he should move, next Session, for the appointment of a Select Committee, a course to which the House would probably assent; but the effect of referring this Bill to a Select Committee would be altogether to prevent it passing this Session. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Member would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. HADFIELD said, he must press his Amendment.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his Amendment, for unless he did so the Indemnity Bill might run the risk of not passing this year. Surely the hon. Member did not intend that the persons who had not taken the oaths should be liable to the pains and penalties to which they would be subjected unless the Bill passed into law. If the hon. Member would next Session bring forward the grievances which he believed persons laboured under from the experience of the present law, and point out how changes could be made, he might then properly ask for a Select Committee; but it would not be proper to stop the progress of the Bill in order that the hon. Member might obtain a Select Committee in this manner. This would be to prevent a present remedy to evils about which they were all agreed. At this period of the Session it would be better to allow the Bill to pass as usual, and if the hon. Member moved for a Select Committee next Session he would meet with support on that side of the House.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

[BILL 18.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read the third time."

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE: Sir, in moving that this Bill be read a third time upon this day three months, I do not intend to enter at any length into a discussion of the merits of the Bill, or of its object or probable results. All of these subjects have already been discussed at considerable length, and hon. Gentlemen have expressed their opinions upon them. What I desire to do is to call attention to the position of the Bill, to the course of proceeding with regard to it, and to the results growing out of these proceedings. For the purpose of my argument I am willing to suppose that every Gentleman in this House will adhere to the opinions he has previously expressed on the Bill. What I wish to point out is, that if the different parties in this House do adhere to the opinions previously expressed, the decision ought to be different from that of former divisions, and the Bill ought to be rejected.

Throughout its progress there have been three distinct opinions as to the proper mode of dealing with it. The hon. Member who introduced it (Mr. Dodson) and those who agreed with him, were desirous that the Bill should pass as introduced, and were unwilling to accept any Amendment. On the other hand there were those on this side the House who thought that the difficulties of legislating on the subject were out of all proportion to any advantages to be derived from the proposed change, or to any disadvantages intended to be removed. We therefore not only objected to the Bill as it stands, but declined to take on ourselves the responsibility of proposing Amendments; which, however, we were ready to consider if proposed by others. The third section, headed by my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while they emphatically declared that the Bill could not pass in the form in which it was introduced by the hon. Member for Sussex, said that it was without much difficulty capable of Amendments which would make it in their opinion useful, and they accordingly voted for the second reading, with an intimation that they should oppose it in future stages, if not so amended. That is the position in which the Bill stands. The second reading was carried by a small majority, and was supported by many holding the views of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Time went on and no Amendments appeared. We took it for granted that notice of Amendments would have been given by the other side. None appeared, however, and we asked the House to refuse to go into Committee on the ground that no notice had been given of those Amendments, which the right hon. Gentlemen opposite, supporters of the Bill, admitted to be necessary. The House, nevertheless, went into Committee. A considerable interval of time elapsed, and plenty of time was allowed for notice of Amendments. Still none appeared. The Bill has gone through Committee in its original state; and now, on its third reading, it stands in precisely the same form as that in which it was introduced. I make no complaint of that. It was very natural that the hon. Gentleman who brought in the Bill should not desire to amend it; and if he had accepted Amendments at all, it would probably have been only because he would have preferred them to losing his Bill. Neither do I complain of my right hon. Friends for not bringing forward Amendments. I know that they had applied themselves to the framing of important Amendments and had found the difficulties insurmountable, and that they thought it better to abandon the attempt. I do not complain of either side; but I do say if this Bill was supported on its second reading by a considerable number of Members only on the faith of expected Amendments, of which it was alleged to be capable, and if it has gone through so far without attempt at amendment, that I am then entitled to claim the votes of the right hon. Gentlemen, and all who sympathize with them, and to ask them to assist me in rejecting the Bill on the third reading. It is for the hon. Member for Sussex (Mr. Dodson) to consider whether it would not be better for him at some other time to frame and introduce a measure more likely to receive general support. For the present, at any rate, I venture to think that the course which I recommend is the best.

On the present occasion I rest my opposition on these special grounds; but, in addition, I will ask the House to remember, as a matter of fact, that the Bill does not now stand in such a form as will put Oxford in any way in the same position as Cambridge. It will put Oxford in a situation very much in advance, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) would call it, but, as I think, in a very much worse position; and hon. Members who will support the third reading will do so on the distinct understanding that they are doing what has not yet been sanctioned for either University. On these grounds I beg to move that the Bill be read a third time this day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir William Heathcote.)

The House divided:—Ayes 150; Noes 140: Majority 10.

Northcote, Sir S.

Main Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, the House had been taken somewhat by surprise, and had come to a division earlier than had been expected owing to the remarkable policy of Her Majesty's Government. It would be remembered that the Government were in a position of some embarrassment on account of the course taken on the second reading of this Bill. When the Bill was passing the second reading the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, who he saw had now returned to the House, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer supported the Bill, and the ground they gave for supporting it was, not that they agreed with the Bill as a whole, or in its most important clauses, but that they objected to the principle of indiscriminate resistance, as they were pleased to call it; and they told the House that, although they should like to see certain alterations in the Bill—such as the striking out of the clauses that allowed those who were not members of the Church of England to vote in Convocation—still they should support the Bill for the sake of other clauses of very inferior importance that it contained. On that plea they supported the Bill; and they gave the House to understand that they intended to support Amendments in Committee which would make the Bill such as they desired to see it. They gave the House to understand that they gave no support or countenance to the principle of a Bill which handed over the government of the Universities for educational purposes to Dissenting Masters of Arts. But in Committee there were proposed none of those Amendments which the Government foreshadowed. The right hon. Member for Oxford University (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was absent on that occasion [Cries of "Divide!"]. Surely they would allow him to proceed to discuss the matter especially when the small majority just announced was gained by a snapped division. This Bill was not debated on going into Committee, and they could not object to the discussion of it now. They might, at all events, be well excused for deliberately considering all the events before they came to a further expression of their opinion. This was a measure such as had never passed the House of Commons before. It absolutely handed over the Government of the University to those not of the Church of England. Those on the opposite side might think that was a desirable measure, but they could not say it was a measure of that insignificance that it was to be dispatched in ten minutes. What he wanted was to draw their attention to the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who having given the House to understand on the second reading that Amendments would be moved in Committee, and who in Committee abstained from moving any such Amendments, now in the third reading, when the division was called for, the right hon. Gentleman who was the representative of the Government for the purposes of this Bill, and to whose Department the measure specially belonged, would not give an opinion on this important matter, but walked out of the House. He (Lord R. Cecil) did not think that a Bill of this character ought to pass without some explanation from the responsible Minister of the Crown. It was hardly dealing fairly with the House of Commons to hold out opinions on the second reading and then not to follow them up by his conduct. At all events, the right hon. Gentleman who had warned them against

"indiscriminating resistance," had given them a good idea that evening of what discriminating resistance was. It meant promising to oppose a Bill when no great party struggle was in prospect, and not opposing it when party votes became of consequence. "Discriminating resistance" was discriminating in point of time; it was resistance when it suited. But, at all events, some gratitude was due to those, whoever they might be, who enriched their native language. "Running away" was a coarse and vulgar term. It was now called "discriminating resistance." They had had lately a good many specimens of "discriminating resistance." We should soon have to discuss a foreign policy in which "discriminating resistance" had been shown. ["Question."] Surely it was material to show how perfectly consistent the foreign policy of the Government was, whether they were dealing with the domestic or the foreign question. In each case they promised to render help when it was convenient, and when it ceased to be convenient they walked out of the House. ["Divide, divide!"] He saw that the House was not much inclined for discussion. He only rose to draw attention to the conduct of one of the chief members of Her Majesty's Government, and he trusted that before the House finally decided on this important question the right hon. Gentleman would explain the course which he had pursued.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I am quite ready to afford the noble Lord the explanation which he asks, but in doing so I must disclaim the character in which he has spoken of me as the representative of Her Majesty's Government on this occasion. In the previous discussion upon this Bill I spoke only my own individual opinions; and in speaking these opinions I did not, as the noble Lord has imputed to me, promise to oppose this Bill at any stage. I agreed with the principle of the Bill, but I said that I thought my hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) would act wisely if instead of asking what I thought Parliament would not be likely to grant—if instead of pressing the Bill in a shape in which I felt that it could not ultimately pass—he would consent to the introduction of Amendments which would place Oxford on the same footing as Cambridge. I was prepared to go further and to give to Masters of Arts a right to vote, for Members of Parliament as members of Convocation. I thought that that would have been a more prudent course, and would have resulted in the acceptance by Parliament of a Bill which would have done justice to those who are now excluded from privileges which they have a right to enjoy. I did my best by private communications with my hon. Friend to induce him to agree to such a modification of the Bill, and I have reason to believe that if he had consented to it there were those on the opposite side actuated by a spirit very different from that of the noble Lord, who would have met my hon. Friend in a spirit of generous conciliation, and that a Bill would have passed through Parliament which would have been a great amendment of the existing law. Not objecting to the principle of the Bill I did not feel myself bound to vote against it on the third reading. I should willingly have seen the Bill in another shape, but I never promised to oppose it, I never promised to introduce Amendments, I did not wish to press those Amendments against the judgment of my hon. Friend, and I thought that I was only taking a course which became me in not recording a vote either against or in favour of the Bill, but in walking out of the House when the Question was put. The noble Lord says that this is not a fitting question to be disposed of in ten minutes. Why did not the noble Lord, who was here when the Amendment was moved by the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford, rise in his place, and state the ground upon which he was opposed to the third reading of the Bill? Now that the Amendment has been negatived, he is taking a most unusual course in order to gain the advantage of the votes of any hon. Members who may happen to come down to the House. He had a right to comment upon my conduct if he thought fit to do so. I have stated the reasons which influenced me, and I hope that the House will not think that I have acted improperly.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The right hon. Gentleman says that when he spoke the other day he expressed only his individual opinion, and did not speak as the organ of the Government. I suppose that he has to-night again spoken in his individual capacity, and consequently, up to the present moment, we have not been favoured with the opinions of Her Majesty's Government upon this Bill. But who, let me ask, is the Member of Her Majesty's Government who speaks to the House upon this subject merely in his individual capacity? It is the Home Secretary. And in whose Department, I should like to know, are questions affecting the Universities of this land, if not in that of the Home Secretary? If the right hon. Gentleman tells us—as I conclude he means to tell us—that Her Majesty's Government have really no opinion as a Government upon this important Bill, I am perfectly willing to believe the statement, and I shall not go through the useless form of expressing at it a surprise which I do not feel. But I hope it will go forth to the country that upon a measure affecting one of the most famous and venerable Universities of the land Her Majesty's Government express no opinion, have no opinion, and, so far as the Department charged with the affairs of the Universities is concerned, do not even give a vote upon this important measure. With respect to what the right hon. Gentleman has said about my noble Friend not rising after my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Heathcote), I must say that I never heard a more unjust or a more unfounded charge. My hon. Friend had stated the objections to the Bill in very clear and precise terms, and no one rose to answer him—not even a Member of Her Majesty's Government. Was my noble Friend the Member for Stamford to rise and beat the air—to fight with shadows when no one had replied to my hon. Friend? It was unnecessary for him to occupy the attention of the House merely to support what had been so well said by my hon. Friend. But, after the course which Her Majesty's Government have taken, he was quite justified in making the observations which he has done with reference to their conduct; and when this scene is described, when this debate is read to-morrow, it will not redound to the credit of the Government.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, that the House was placed in a very remarkable position. Early in the evening the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) declined to answer a question asked by his noble Friend the Member for Northamptonshire (Lord Burghley) with reference to Denmark, in the absence of the noble Lord at the head of the Government; and now no reply had been given to the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford. The right hon. Gentleman the other Member for that University was on the Treasury Bench, and he was perfectly astonished that he had given no explanation of the course which he intended to pursue. The position in which the House was placed at present was a very remarkable one. When a debate took place the Members of the Government sat still and made no reply, and hon. Gentlemen who sat behind them thought it prudent to hold their tongue. He hoped that this occasion would not be forgotten, and that the House would go to another division upon this important Bill.

Mr. NEATE rose to address the House; but the cries for a division were so continuous, and the confusion so general, that the hon. Member sat down without proceeding.

Mr. COLLINS also rose to speak; but the interruption was so great that the hon. Member could not be intelligibly heard.

Main Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 170; Noes 170.

[BILL 90.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Repeal of recited Provisions, and Substitution of amended Provision).

MR. AYRTON, who had given notice to move at the end of the clause to add these words—

“Provided he shall have been truly informed by such householder of the circumstances under which he is required to depart, and shall be given into custody by such householder,” said, the object of the Amendment was to secure to the musician as a condition precedent to his arrest a knowledge of the circumstances under which he was given into custody. The hon. Member was proceeding when he was interrupted by cries for a division; whereon the hon. Gentleman said, he would move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 138: Majority 86.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "provided he shall have been informed by the person making such charge of the circumstances under which he is required to depart."—(Mr. Ayrton.)

MR. ADDERLEY said, a lady might be engaged in her domestic duties, and a German brass band with twenty performers might come to the window and blow a terrific blast. By the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman she would have to state to each performer why she wished them all to go away. They perhaps would be unable to understand English, and she might not be able to speak German. Well, then, the Amendment provided that the notice should be given to the musician by the householder. Why the householder might not be at home, and in that case the musician might play as long as he liked.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Amendment was altogether unnecessary, because the present law provided that a person playing an instrument in the street, to the annoyance of an inhabitant, could be ordered to remove, and if he refused he could be summoned.

MR. LOCKE said, it was quite obvious that the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood the Amendment. As the clause now stood it was altogether unnecessary that any communication should be made to the musician. If the Amendment were not adopted it would be left to the caprice of any one to direct a policeman to take a street musician into custody.

MR. CLAY said, he could see no objection to an Amendment requiring that the musician should be informed by some person in the house of the reason why he was told to withdraw. But it was utterly unreasonable to provide that the householder should perform that duty, for the householder might be absent, or might be laid up by illness.

MR. AYRTON said, he was ready to alter the Amendment by providing that the person who told the musician to retire should state the reason for his so doing.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 98: Majority 31.

MR. AYRTON moved, at the end of the clause to add—"Provided he shall be given into custody by the person making the charge." His object was to provide that the charge should be made on the responsibility of the inhabitant of the house, and not merely on that of the policeman.

SIR GEORGE GREY thought that the Amendment was a reasonable one.

MR. LONGFIELD also supported the Amendment.

MR. WHALLEY complained of the arbitrary conduct of the metropolitan police, and said the Bill would largely increase their power.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR GEORGE GREY then moved at the end of the clause to add—

"Provided that the person making a charge for an offence against this Act, shall accompany the constable who shall take into custody any person offending as aforesaid, to the nearest police station-house, and there sign the charge-sheet kept for such purposes."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR GEORGE GREY moved to insert new clause—

"Whenever any person charged with an offence under this Act, shall be brought to any station-house during the time when the police court shall be shut, it shall be lawful for the constable in charge of the station-house to require the person making the charge to enter into a recognizance conditional as is provided by the Act passed in the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 72; and, upon the refusal of such person to do so, it shall be lawful for such constable to discharge from custody the person so charged."

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. AYRTON moved to add at end of the clause—

"And upon such recognizance being entered into, it shall be lawful for the said constable to discharge from custody the person so charged, on his entering into a recognizance to appear to answer the same."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the proviso was already contained in the existing law.

Amendment withdrawn.

MR. AYRTON moved to insert clause—

"Any person who shall sound or play any musical instrument, or shall sing in any thoroughfare near any premises licensed for the sale of beer, wine, or spirits, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s., and it shall be lawful for any constable belonging to the metropolitan police force, to apprehend any such person if he shall continue so playing or singing, after being warned to desist therefrom, in view of such constable."

MR. WALTER thought there was an ambiguity in the clause which required explanation. At present the words seemed somewhat invidious. He had no objection to bands being required to remove upon being warned; but from whom was the warning to come? If from the householder he should not object, but if it was intended that any person passing along the street should have the power to order the removal of a band, he should certainly object to such a power. He had noticed that bands near public houses were generally tolerably good bands, and not mere barrel organs. He could not but suspect that the words were intentionally ambiguous, and certainly they would enable a person passing along the road to order the removal of a band.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY moved to insert proviso—

"That nothing in this Act contained shall extend or apply to a dramatic representation usually performed in the streets of the metropolis, and generally known as the show of Punch and Judy, nor to any person representing any of the characters in such show, nor to any music performed or played in connection with such show, in the same manner as has been usual before the passing of this Act; but such dramatic representation, show, and music may continue to be played as heretofore, before the passing of this Act."

MR. PEACOCKE said, that the only effect of the insertion of such a clause in the Bill would be to render their legislation ridiculous.

MR. CLAY said, he hoped the Committee would assent to the clause, and afford the necessary protection to an innocent amusement.

MR. HUNT said, he believed the Bill would not in any way interfere with Punch and Judy.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that if Punch were to sound any musical instrument, and was ordered to withdraw, he would run a great risk of being taken to the station-house if he resisted that order.

MR. BASS said, he had no wish to oppose the clause.

SIR GEORGE GREY did not think the representation of Punch and Judy would come under the Bill unless accompanied by music. He agreed that the clause would make the Bill absurd.

Mr. Ayrton

Clause (This Act not to extend to Punch and Judy)—(Mr. Hankey)—brought up, and read 1^o.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 65: Majority 31.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 186.]

ALLEGED REVIVAL OF THE HOLY ALLIANCE.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, referring to the extraordinary despatches which had recently been published in The Morning Post, and to the denial given by the Prussian Government of their genuineness, said he hoped he should clearly understand from the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs that the disavowal extended not merely to the text of those despatches, but to the transactions themselves, to which those papers professed to relate, in whatever words they might be clothed.

EARL RUSSELL was understood to say, that the denial of the Prussian Government extended to the transactions themselves. He could only repeat that the despatches were not genuine.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, the communication made by the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs respecting the Correspondence alleged to have passed between Prussia and other Foreign Powers left some doubt, not as to the contradiction of the Correspondence itself, but regarding the circumstances to which it referred. He therefore wished to state that it was his intention before public business was proceeded with to-morrow to draw attention to the prevailing rumours concerning a revival of the so-called Holy Alliance, and to inquire whether the Government have any information on the subject that they can lay before Parliament?

EARL RUSSELL hoped his noble Friend correctly apprehended the statement he had made. The denial was put forward on the part of Prussia, and not of any other Power.

NAVY—ARMOUR-PLATED VESSELS— THE "KEARSARGE" AND THE "ALABAMA."—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE rose to call the attention of the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset) to the recent engagement between the Kearsarge and the Alabama, and asked if the attention of the Government had been called to the defence of the Kearsarge by means of chain-armour, and its power of resisting shot; and, further, if the Government had in the numerous experiments it had made, tested the value as a means of defence of ships of war of chain-armour? This was not the first time they had heard of chain armour being used in this way, for in 1862, Mr. Rowan, of Belfast, addressed a long letter to Lord Palmerston on the subject, which he would not read to the House, but would hand to the noble Duke.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the defence afforded by the chain-plating to the Kearsarge must have been very small, for it only extended over a space about thirty-six feet in length, and the chain was of the kind known as $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch. In order to judge of the strength of any armour it was necessary that the shots should strike it. Now the firing from the Alabama could not have been good, for this strip of armouring was only struck twice during the engagement; one of the shots glanced off, and the other, which was the only one that hit the armour fairly, pierced it and lodged in the side of the vessel. At the same time, it was known that the Alabama entered upon the contest under great disadvantages, her powder being either damp or very bad, and the vessel herself in a very unfit state. Two or three years ago the Admiralty made some experiments with chain-armour, and the result was that with a common 68-pounder and cast-iron shot it was knocked all to pieces—so that against steel projectiles it would afford no defence whatever. It did not at all follow that, as a make-shift, it would not be better than nothing, and at long distances, as in this case, it had some advantages. But what the Admiralty had to decide was—Given a certain weight, how to apply it most effectively for the defence of a ship? Some time ago the noble Earl opposite expressed a doubt whether guns weighing $6\frac{1}{2}$ tons each would not be found too heavy for broadside purposes. He had since been informed that the two 11-inch guns on board the Kearsarge, one before and the other abaft the mainmast, weighed each $7\frac{1}{2}$ tons. The real conclusions to be drawn from the conflict between the Kearsarge and Alabama were that very powerful guns and very speedy vessels were required. The speed of the Kearsarge gave her great superiority over the Alabama, which, moreover, was not built for fighting purposes, but mainly with a view to cruising. Experiments had shown conclusively that the continuous surface of armour-plate yielded great advantages over interrupted surfaces like bar-iron or chain covering; no new information has been derived from the action between these two vessels.

LONDON (CITY) TITHES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Debate on Motion for Second Reading resumed.

After further short Debate, which was almost totally inaudible,

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, in calling the attention of the House to the petitions that have been presented against certain alterations lately made in the rules of the Board of National Education in Ireland in favour of convent schools, as tending to substitute a sectarian for an united system of education, it is right that I should state that, however desirable it undoubtedly is that the poorer classes of different Christian denominations should be unitedly educated, to the extent that such education, based upon Scriptural instruction, may be freely accepted, I have ever considered the principle upon which united education was provided for under the rules of the National Board as most objectionable, and the means vainly resorted to for enforcing its acceptance upon the clergy and Protestants of Ireland to have been utterly unjustifiable. But, while my own opinions are thus opposed to the National system, I am sensible that among those who differ from me, there are many who have given it their support from the belief of its having been devised with much wisdom, and calculated, if faithfully carried out, to confer the greatest benefit upon the country. It is, indeed, pretty generally admitted to have failed of accomplishing what was expected from it; but it has sincere and ardent patrons, who cling to the belief that its admirable staff of Inspectors, its many trained teachers, and its model schools, above all, which are very ably conducted, exhibiting a fair sample of what the National system was designed to be, and where, under the rules of the Commissioners, young persons are trained for the office of teacher, may yet be the means of rendering the system popular and effective over the country. Hence they view with great jealousy any interference with the model schools, or the establishment of rival institutions of an opposite character. Such are the persons that have petitioned the House against the alterations I have referred to in the rules of the National Board, as a departure from the principle upon which the National system was established. They have undoubtedly a right to claim redress at the hands of the Government of whose educational policy they have been the steady supporters; and it is no less clearly the duty of Parliament to require that the large annual grant of more than £300,000 for the education of the poorer classes in Ireland should be faithfully administered, in strict conformity with its fundamental regulations. It is true that since I gave notice of bringing this subject before your Lordships, a Resolution, to the effect "That the new rules of the National Board, with regard to the aid to be afforded to convent and monastic schools, are at variance with the principle of the National System of Education," has been negatived by the House of Commons. If, however, report says truth, the subject was discussed in so thin a House as to have been at one time nearly counted out; and the Resolution may, therefore, have been decided upon by persons little acquainted with the subject; but, whatever may have been the cause of the Resolution having been negatived, such a verdict cannot, in the face of the facts of the case, be satisfactory to the public. It is tantamount to a declaration that the National system is properly sectarian, and its design to abet the pretensions of the Church of Rome to the absolute control of the education of the Irish population. But, on the other hand, it may be said that the petitions against the new rules have been but few, and do not indicate any widespread dissatisfaction. They certainly do not, for obvious reasons, come from the great body of the Roman Catholics. The interests of these, or rather of the Roman Catholic Church, in the matter are managed—and they could not be in more able hands—by the Roman Catholic hierarchy. The petitions are, in fact, all from the Presbyterian body, except one from the Ulster National Education Society, which includes, along with the name of the Lord Bishop of a great northern diocese, many members of the Established Church; but, though numerically they are few, their importance consists in this, that they represent the views of every intelligent Protestant that takes any real interest in the scheme, so called, of united education. Now, what are the complaints that they have put forward? The Presbyterian petitions, I find, do not materially differ from one another, nor from that of the Ulster Association, which only enters more fully into the particulars of the alterations last year made in the rules of 1855. All express approval of the National system, and of the model schools of the Board, and agree in representing the convent schools as denominational and sectarian, and therefore at variance with the main object of the institution, namely, united education. They point to the rules recently introduced as manifestly designed to render convent schools and monks' schools training institutions for National School teachers, and to supersede the use of the model schools for that purpose; as a consequence of which teachers will be sent forth imbued with sectarian prejudices, instead of being fitly trained, as in the model schools, to carry out a strictly non-sectarian principle of education. The Ulster petition complains of a further distinct preference shown to one religious denomination, in that while clergymen generally are absolutely excluded from discharging the duties of teachers in National Schools, the members of the religious orders of the Church of Rome, whether monks or nuns, are at once recognized as duly qualified for the office, without undergoing any kind of examination. These are grounds I should conceive quite sufficient to call for a complete review of the system, to ascertain whether it is in fact what it originally purposed to be—a system of united education, strictly non-sectarian, and administered with faithful impartiality. I do not wish to prefer a Bill of indictment against the Commissioners, but four members of their own body have found reason to protest against their proceedings with respect to convent schools; and a circumstance came subsequently to light—their suppression of an important public paper bearing directly upon the merits of convent and monastic schools—that appears to me to stamp their conduct with unfaithfulness in the administration of a most important trust. It is necessary to observe that there had been from the beginning a general acquiescence in the very questionable decision the Board early came to of taking convent schools into connection with the National system in the face of the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons of 1825, which distinctly stated that they were unsuited for the purposes of united education; nor were the Commissioners ever reproached for the favour and consideration they showed to the communities of nuns, in admitting their qualifications as teachers without examination. The merits and zealous devotion of the nuns to the charitable duties they undertook, as educators of Roman Catholic poor, no one was disposed to call in question; but when it became plainly the intention of the Commissioners that monks and nuns, without having received any training under the National Board, and holding themselves responsible to none but their ecclesiastical superiors, should be invested with the very important functions of training those who are to teach in the National Schools with which the country is overspread, it was time for the friends of the National system to object. They have accordingly appealed to both Houses of Parliament. The paper I have alluded to as having been suppressed by the Commissioners is the Report of one of their Head Inspectors, Mr. Sheridan, a Roman Catholic, much impressed with the merits of the religious houses within his district, and anxious, in the discharge of the duties of his office, to improve the efficiency of the schools under their superintendence. It is remarkable that this gentleman's Report, written in ignorance of the Commissioners' views, was sent in about the time that they were preparing their new rules for giving increased endowments, extension, and importance, to the convent and monastery schools; but, being clearly condemnatory of the step they were taking, it was withheld from publication in the appendix to their Annual Report, in which it was customary it should have appeared, and it is probable it never would have been produced had it not been called for by an order of the House of Commons. I will, with your Lordships' permission, read what bears immediately on the question of the fitness or unfitness of these schools for what the Commissioners intend to make them—

"Teachers who are members of religious communities are monks and nuns, and are the teachers of the class of schools called Convent National Schools. The importance of these schools may be measured by the fact that thirty-five of them (from one, having been recently established, no Return was obtained) commanded, in 1860, a gross average daily attendance of 9,105 pupils, or about one-fifth of the gross average daily attendance of all the other 864 National Schools taken together.

"These teachers are not classified by the Board, nor are they required to submit to an examination, as the Commissioners take for granted that they are sufficiently well educated to discharge the duties of National teachers efficiently; and, in point of fact, it is undeniable that the majority of them—of the nuns especially—are infinitely better educated than the teachers of ordinary National Schools, while it is equally true that they bring to the discharge of their duties a disinterestedness and devotedness to which even the most zealous of the lay teachers can have no claim. It is also undeniable that their schools do an incalculable amount of good. Their pupils receive a moral and religious training of the highest order; they are educated to habits of truth-telling, modesty, order, and cleanliness; and such of them as attend with fair regularity, and continue at school till they reach the upper classes, are sure to receive an excellent literary education.

"(a.) These teachers very seldom have any opportunity of receiving a technical training as teachers, either before or after making their religious profession; and hence, although they are undoubtedly well-educated in a general sense, I apprehend that many of them have a very limited acquaintance with those improved methods of teaching and school organization which have received the sanction of experience. The want of such technical knowledge is most apparent in their management of the junior classes.

"(b.) It is a characteristic of these teachers that they are impatient of competition. A rival school, if it can possibly be extinguished, is not allowed to exist. In crowded cities this is, of course, impossible; but in Tralee, Killarney, Newcastle, Kinsale, Queenstown, Middleton, Skibbereen, Bandon, Dingle, and a host of smaller towns, no female schools, except those connected with convents, are to be found; none are permitted to be established. In some of them, indeed, such as Tralee, Killarney, Newcastle, and Dingle, in which there are monks' schools as well as nuns' schools, even the ordinary male National Schools have been proscribed.

"Now, I am perfectly convinced that in pursuing this policy these worthy teachers are actuated by good motives. They have faith in themselves, as all earnest devoted teachers have, or ought to have; and, believing conscientiously that their own schools are best adapted for the proper training of youth, they consider themselves justified in using all their influence to remove other schools out of the way. But to me such a policy appears most objectionable. It savours of intolerance. In fact—there is no use in mincing words—it is intolerance; and like every other intolerant policy, the evils it gives rise to are more than sufficient to counterbalance the good it is expected to effect.

"In the first place, in every mass of population, while there is, undoubtedly, a large proportion of children that will attend the schools of religious communities in preference to any other, there is always, on the other hand, a not inconsiderable number of children who would readily attend lay schools, but cannot be induced to frequent those conducted by religious teachers. Let it be understood that I am not alluding to children of different denominations, but only to Catholic children. What is the result? When the lay schools are extinguished, a considerable portion of the children of the poor of the locality receive no education whatever. In the town of Killarney there are two convent schools and one monks' school for the education of the children of a population amounting to nearly 6,000 persons. No day school conducted by lay teachers would be tolerated there. Well, I have it on the best authority that the number of children attending schools in Killarney is considerably less than that of those who never enter a school.

"In the next place, this impatience of competition not only extinguishes the principle of emulation, which exercises a healthy stimulating influence upon schools as upon individuals, but also leads the conductors of convent schools to admit pupils without limit—without any reference to the available teaching power. The expediency—the necessity—of restricting the attendance to that number which the schools are capable of accommodating conveniently, or the teachers of instructing efficiently, is practically ignored. The school-rooms in most cases are crowded to excess, the attendance out of all proportion to the teaching power. The inevitable result is that in such schools the rate of progress is extremely slow; it takes a very long time for a child to work her way from the lowest to the highest class, and, in point of fact, comparatively few ever reach that goal. The great majority leave the school, and give up schooling, before they have completed half the school course."

Now, my Lords, it was certainly an inexcusable act of the Commissioners of National Education to attempt to suppress a public document of this kind, which the Government and the public should have had full opportunity of considering in connection with their new rules. Their disingenuous conduct in this and other matters connected with the alteration of their rules naturally aroused the indignation of the friends of the National system, and at a large and influential meeting held at Belfast, at which the right rev. Prelate opposite was present, it was animadverted upon in very strong terms by the right rev. Prelate himself, as well as by others who addressed the meeting. The changes of the rules were regarded as "A violation of a solemn compact entered into with the friends of the National system, a treacherous departure from what they were led to believe would be its rules. They had met together to defend the system, not against the attacks of honourable and open adversaries who conscientiously oppose it, but to guard it against the insidious changes of professing friends."

Such was the tone of indignant rebuke with which the Commissioners' conduct was noticed by their friends in the North. I confess that I did not view their proceedings, except in respect of the disingenuousness by which they were characterized, with any surprise. It must be in the recollection of many of your Lordships that about four years ago there was a kind of crisis in the existence of the National system, in consequence of the declared hostility of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to the principle of the system, and their special denunciation of the model schools, from which they caused a general, and in some instances a total withdrawal of the Roman Catholic pupils. A correspondence thence ensued between them and the Irish Government, in which they so ably pressed their views of the importance of interweaving religious with secular instruction, and of the responsibilities of ministers of the Church when called upon to take part in the education of youth, that Mr. Secretary Cardwell, who conducted the correspondence on the part of the Government, being utterly incapable of answering them, and unwilling to make an open surrender of the principles of the National system, compromised the matter by adding to the number of Roman Catholic members on the Board, so as to give them a predominating influence in its proceedings. Was it to be supposed that a concession so made was to be of no further avail? Certainly not. It was legitimately to be regarded by the Roman Catholic prelates as a means to the attainment of what was not openly granted. The dominant party on the Board immediately proceeded to compass the object of their Church by extending the system of convent education, and investing the religious communities with the duties, hitherto confined to the model schools, of training teachers who would go forth from the convent walls trained in subjection to no other authority than that of the hierarchy. And what is the defence that the Commissioners have made since their proceedings have been called in question? They do not attempt to show that they are warranted by any reference to the principles of the National system. In what is termed their explanatory paper they divert attention from the question at issue by giving a history of the convent schools, showing at once how great have been their services, and how much underpaid, about which no question had arisen; but the Attorney General for Ireland himself, one of the Commissioners, is reported to have defended their course of action on the occasion of the late debate in another place, on the ground of precedent, remarking—

“That the Presbyterian schools of Ulster, under the amended rules of the Board, which were amended in favour of the Presbyterians of Ulster, in his judgment, against the interest of the Board, were to a large extent quite as exclusive as the convent schools. They had all other clergymen excluded from them.”

Now, if the National system is to be upheld with any pretence of carrying out its original and declared object, it appears to me that it is indispensably necessary, not only that its rules should be carefully reviewed and corrected, but that the Board should be reconstructed, and made a paid, responsible Board; and that all exceptional and exclusive privileges—whether to monks, nuns, or Presbyterians—should be done away with. There can be no doubt that, as at present constituted, there is a preponderant power given to one denomination, that practically invests the Roman Catholic hierarchy with a controlling power over the education of the poorer classes over the whole of Ireland. The growth of the power of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland has been very apparent ever since, and through means of the institution of the National System of Education. The first and great step towards its present development was when it was announced in the charter letter of its institution, dated October, 1881, and signed “E. G. Stanley,” that the reading of the Bible in the National Schools was a vital defect, inasmuch as it was contrary to the principle of the Roman Catholic Church to allow it; that, therefore, the reading of the Sacred Volume was to be excluded from the proposed plan of united education. In lieu of the Bible, however, some Scripture extracts, admirably adapted to assist the moral training of the school children, were ordered to be made use of. But not many years elapsed before the extracts were objected to by the Roman Catholic priests, as the Bible before had been, and in 1889 those extracts of Scripture were, like the Bible, eliminated from the course of instruction provided for general use in the schoolroom. There remained, however, a tablet suspended on the walls of every schoolroom, exhibiting to the view of the assembled children the Ten Commandments. This remnant of the authority of God's Word in the work of united education could not long be tolerated, and therefore, in a subsequent amendment of the rules, it is announced that “the use of the tablet containing the Ten Commandments is not compulsory.” How completely Scripture authority was thenceforward excluded from the National system was two years ago plainly acknowledged by the Commissioners. A well-meant effort was made in the beginning of 1862, by the right rev. Prelate opposite and other devoted friends of the National system, to have the rule regarding the use of the Sacred Volume so far relaxed as to enable the managers and teachers of National Schools to make such slight and casual reference to the Word of God, at the time of secular instruction, as occasion should absolutely call for. After considerable endeavours on the part of the Commissioners of Education to evade giving a direct answer to so inconvenient an application, an answer was at length plainly given, and the humiliating duty devolved upon the Lord Lieutenant, the representative of our Protestant Sovereign in Ireland, of conveying to the right rev. Prelate the declaration that to permit any reference whatever to the Word of God, during the hours of combined instruction, would be subversive of the fundamental principle of the National System of Education. Thus, so far as morality is to be inculcated in National Schools, it is to be wholly independent of the moral teaching of the Bible. But, it may be asked, is there not a lesson of morality required to be hung up in every school? Undoubtedly there is, but though it aims at the commendable object of promoting harmony and good-will, how does it go about it? A copy of it that I hold in my hand is given in the Appendix to the last public Report of the Commissioners. It sets out with saying, “Christians should endeavour, as the Apostle Paul commands them, to ‘live peaceably with all men;’” then follows the Scripture reference, “Romans, c. 12, v. 17.” The same Scripture reference appears also in all the previously published copies of the lesson, but it was a blunder, no doubt accidental, and by persons more conversant with Scripture than the Commissioners appear to have been would have been earlier corrected. The words of the text referred to are, "Recompense to no man evil for evil; provide things honest in the sight of all men." The proper reference for the words quoted would be Romans, c. 12, v. 18, which says "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you live peaceably with all men;" to which words the Commissioners have most improperly added, "even with those of a different religious persuasion;" thereby suggesting to the minds of the children, what it was the proposed purpose of united education to guard against, that the very last persons with whom they were to live peaceably were those of a different religious persuasion. In the next paragraph the lesson says that "Our Saviour Christ taught His disciples to love even their enemies." But if the Bible were not a closed book, the children would see that the word even was an interpolation of the Commissioners not warranted by any part of our Lord's teaching. In the next paragraph it is written—

"Many men hold erroneous doctrines, but we ought not to hate or persecute them. We ought to seek for the truth, and to hold fast what we are convinced is the truth, but not to treat harshly those who are in error."

"Holding erroneous doctrines," "being in error," "seeking for the truth," and "holding it fast," are phrases I should say hardly intelligible to young children who are not informed of what is the standard of sound doctrine—where or what the truth is. It therefore appears to have been alike needless and mischievous, however well intended, to suggest to the children's minds the notions of hatred, persecution, or harsh treatment of those who are in error. There is, however, one circumstance in this part of the general lesson illustrative of the progress of Roman Catholic authority in the National System of Education. It appears, as now drawn up in the new rules, that the Commissioners have struck out the words "We ought to seek for the truth." This was, no doubt, done in compliance with the representations that had been made to the Board that such a precept was inconsistent with the principle of the Roman Catholic Church. So that, because Roman Catholics are not allowed to seek for the truth, Protestants, under the Board's teaching, are to be contented likewise to remain in ignorance. Now, my Lords, let me ask what are the benefits the country has reaped from the National System of Education in Ireland

The Earl of Glancarty

—not, I am bound to say, as originally introduced by the noble Earl, the respected leader of the party on this side of the House, who, I am sorry, is not able to be in his place to-day—but from the system as it has since been growing up, with its accumulation of compromises, concessions, and exceptional arrangements? Has it been instrumental in producing greater harmony between persons of different creeds and parties? I believe that, so far from that being the case, more Acts of Parliament have been passed since than were ever deemed necessary before the institution of the National System of Education, to prevent the occurrence of collisions between Protestants and Roman Catholics, especially in the North of Ireland; and I am justified by the example England presents of the friendly harmony that subsists among persons of different creeds, as well as by my own observation of the beneficial influence of schools that may be called denominational in Ireland, where children are religiously educated in the tenets of the communion to which their parents wish them to belong, in saying that better feelings are thus produced among the rising generation than by forcing a system of united education upon the country. Then, what has been the result of the system in the matter of elementary instruction? The best and most impartial testimony upon the subject will be that of the Census of 1861. What does it show? There were, at the time it was taken, in the whole of Ireland no less than 39 per cent of the population above five years of age unable to read or write. It might, however, be said that those who had emigrated were, for the most part, well educated. Let us see, then, what is the actual effect of the schools upon the youth of Ireland between the ages of five and sixteen, the period of life at which the schools are resorted to. The Return made by the Commissioners shows no less a number than 45 per cent of those unable to read or write. A more striking evidence of the effect of the National School system may be seen from the following Return of the proportion of persons, five years old and upwards, of different religious persuasions, unable to read or write. It is as follows:—Established Church, 16·0; Roman Catholics, 45·8; Presbyterians, 11·1; Methodists, 9·0; Independents, 6·8; Baptists, 9·2; Society of Friends, 4·1; all other persuasions, 11·8; Protestants generally, 13·7; Jews, 11·9. Hence it appears that while the Presbyterian body, supported by an exceptional arrangement with the National Board, have turned their schools to good account in showing so small a proportion as 11 per cent uninstructed in reading and writing, the Established Church, thrown upon its own resources, but with a poor population often scattered through Roman Catholic districts, where they have access to any but a priests' school, has not generally neglected the interests of the Church children when there are but 16 per cent of them illiterate. In the Roman Catholic body may be seen the result of the work done in four-fifths of the National Schools, including the schools in monasteries and convents—the value of which is so much vaunted in the explanatory paper of the Commissioners of National Education. And what is that result? 45·8 of the Roman Catholic population over five years of age that can neither read nor write. I need not comment upon this, but, with your Lordships' permission, will read a few words from an address on social economy by Sir James Emerson Tennant, delivered at the meeting of the Social Science Association at Glasgow, in 1860, his testimony to the character, with regard to intellectual development of the Irish immigrants to large towns in England. He writes—

“The Scotch or Welsh peasant who finds his way to the manufacturing towns of England, from a labourer, becomes in his turn an employer, a tradesman, a shopkeeper, a merchant; but, strange to say, as a general rule, in that humblest of all capacities in which the Irish immigrant lands on the quay of Liverpool or Glasgow—in that capacity, for the most part, he is contented to continue for the remainder of his life. . . . Whence comes it that whilst the labourer of Scotland and of England has the prospect of affluence in the future, the eye to discern and the ambition to attain it, the patient but unambitious peasant of Ireland, unconscious of his own powers and blind to his opportunities, finds his energies arrested in the earliest stage of a career which he is competent, but never destined to run, and in a land overflowing with riches he is contented to remain ‘a servant of servants unto his brethren.’ It would be equally an insult to Ireland and to our own understanding were we to snatch a conclusion, and out short inquiry, by imputing to the Irish some imaginary inequality of race. We have the evidence of the very different career of the Irish in the United States and Canada, and their success there to prove that what might be mistaken for incapacity amongst the Irish in Scotland and in England, is in reality the dormancy, not the deficiency, of ability. It seems to me that much that is anomalous in the character and career of some of the labouring classes in Ireland is to be traced to a grave defect in their early training. An Irishman of the labouring class is seldom taught, nor even permitted, to think for himself.”

Must we not admit, my Lords, that education has been at fault in this matter? And who is there among your Lordships that is connected with, or has visited Ireland, that has not seen and deplored the very backward and manifestly uneducated condition of the lower orders, the absence from their dwellings of that cleanliness, neatness, and economy, as well as of the enjoyment of the comforts of civilized life, which to the English peasant have become indispensable? Why is it that, compared with the sister country, Ireland exhibits over the greater part of her surface so much poverty, helplessness and squalid wretchedness as to have made her condition a very by-word of reproach? What is it that makes the wealth and prosperity of a nation? Not the fertility of its soil; if that were so, the soil of Ireland being naturally more fertile than that of England, the former would be the wealthier and more flourishing of the two. Not the number of its inhabitants; if that were so, Ireland would, eighteen years ago, have presented an example of prosperity far in advance of any other part of the United Kingdom. But we know how much the case was the reverse; that, ere the advent of the great famine in 1846, the overwhelming numbers of her population were the worst fed, the worst clothed, and in a greater proportion houseless and begging their bread, than the population of any other country. Nor does it depend upon the existence of free institutions; if that were so, Ireland, being under the same form of government as England, and enjoying the same political rights, would have reaped the like benefit from them. No, my Lords, the improvement of the condition of Ireland—any hope we may entertain of her prosperity, must depend, under Divine Providence, upon the awakened intelligence and rightly-directed energies of her population, and it is for lack of these conditions having been fulfilled that she is fully twenty-five years behind any civilized country in Europe. The obvious remedy for this is to provide education, not by the intolerant application of any theory of united education that has totally failed, but such education as will meet the ascertained requirements of the country; not the mere elementary teaching of literature, but the education of the character, and, above all, of the Christian character, which alone can impart a right sense of responsibility and of moral rectitude. I will not trouble your Lordships by further observation of my own upon this subject, but will close what I have to say by quoting from a speech not long since delivered by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the subject of education, when it was proposed to introduce into England a system of education, somewhat of the same kind as that which unfortunately exists in Ireland—

"I own that to me, looking to this as a practical question, innumerable difficulties rise up against the adoption of such a proposition. In the first place, I could not but be struck with the answer of one of the boys at the examination to-day, when he was asked for what purpose the Holy Scriptures were given to mankind? and he answered, 'To be the guide of our conduct in life.' Well, now, what an imperfect, lame system must that be which proposes, either by State assistance or voluntary effort, to educate the great body of the people of this country, and yet leave out the knowledge of that which is to guide our conduct through life? Can any omission be more unwise, or more fatal to the object we have in view. . . . The children who receive only secular instruction will conclude most naturally that they have the sum and substance of that which is most necessary for them. That they might attend religious instruction elsewhere is, no doubt, possible; but when you consider the time that is taken up at school, and the occupations of the various ministers of religion, you will see that it is hardly possible in practice that in one place children should receive an adequate secular instruction, and that in another place they should find a minister of religion capable of giving them the whole of the instruction which is required for their religious education. If that is the case, and if it is so important that their conduct in life should be so regulated, will you give them moral instruction apart from the Bible, apart from any religious sanction? That again appears to me to be an equally unwise and fatal course, because if these precepts of morality—these rules for the guidance of their conduct—have a Divine sanction, it ought to be revealed to them, and the counsel of God should not be withheld. . . . I have always contended that this matter of religion is secular as well as religious, that it belongs to us all, that it pervades the whole business of life, and is, in fact, one of those things which ought to be reckoned among the common things of which every household ought to partake. I have ventured to say this much because the question at the present time is not whether education ought to be given so much as of what kind it ought to be."

I have taken the liberty, my Lords, after placing before your Lordships the nature of the objections to the alterations of the rules of the National Board, to notice at some length the working of the education system, and what appears to me to be the just claims of Ireland upon the consideration of the Government. I have done so—I will not say in the hope, for that hope has been too often disappointed, but with the earnest desire, that should the noble Earl the President of the Council answer my question, whether the sanction of the Government will be given to the new rules of the National Board, by telling me that the subject will be considered—that it will be considered irrespective of party interests, and solely with a view to the best interests of the Irish population, as in that case the great question of the Irish difficulty will at length be solved.

THE BISHOP OF DOWN AND CONNOR could not concur with the noble Lord in his condemnation of the National System of Education in Ireland. He could not look with indifference upon a system which embraced 6,000 schools, and educated more than half a million of children of every sect in Ireland. It afforded them not only secular but religious instruction, and, by bringing the children of every sect together, it tended to check the growth of prejudice and bigotry in their minds. He must say, however, that he regarded with no small misgiving and alarm the alterations which had lately been made in the fundamental rules of the Board, the effect of which was to transfer the training of future teachers of the National Schools in Ireland from the model schools, which exemplified the system in its highest and best form, to schools which must from their very character and position be regarded as denominational schools. The question was simply whether the change which had been made was a fundamental one. That had been denied, but in his opinion the change was of that character. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary of Ireland, in writing to the Chief Commissioner, on the 30th of January, said—

"The attention of the Irish Government had been drawn to certain contemplated changes in the fundamental rules of the National System of Education."

Although the right hon. Baronet had thought fit to alter his opinion since that time, he himself concurred entirely in the right hon. Baronet's impressions as expressed in the letter from which he had quoted. He could also refer to the opinions of his right rev. Brother the Bishop of Derry, and of Dr. Henry and others, in confirmation of his view. It would be seen, therefore, that those whose long experience in connection with the subject well qualified them to express an accurate opinion took the same view of the question. The papers presented to their Lordships' House contained protests from some of the earliest members of the Board, who stated that in their opinion the alterations which had been made were fundamental; and in this opinion a majority of the Board concurred. Having many schools in which he took an interest, he could not consent to accept any scheme which he believed to be opposed to the system of National Education. He did not wish that the schools in which he was interested should possess any peculiar privileges, but that they should enjoy all the benefits which were common to every religious body in Ireland. It had been said that the schools of the Presbyterians in Ireland enjoyed at a former date some exceptional privileges; but when that statement was inquired into by a Committee it was found that the Presbyterians possessed no peculiar privileges. The convent schools alone were exceptionally favoured, and he could not but object to the variation of the rules in favour of these schools. They received grants of public money not calculated upon the efficiency of the pupils, but according to the number of children in attendance. Thus the convent schools had a direct interest in enlarging the numbers of children whom they taught, and Mr. Sheridan had stated that in these schools children were admitted without limitations. Of his own knowledge he knew nothing of the efficiency of these schools, but from some remarks of Mr. Sheridan he was led to believe that they were not very efficient. He found that in the model schools 90 per cent of the pupils passed from the lower classes to the upper classes, and in the district schools 52 per cent; but in the convent schools only 23 per cent of the pupils were so advanced. He, therefore, could not think that these schools could be regarded as institutions best fitted to provide future masters and mistresses for the schools in Ireland. Indeed, in his opinion, they must necessarily be inefficient for that purpose, because the ladies who taught in these schools were themselves imperfectly educated. The efficiency of a master depended not so much upon the education he had received as upon his ability to impart that education to others, and it could not be expected that masters trained in schools where the teachers themselves were untrained would be the persons best qualified to conduct the education of the people of Ireland. He denied that any crusade had been set on foot in Belfast against these schools. He gave to the ladies who conducted them the highest credit for performing what was no doubt to them a labour of love, and they were, he fully believed, actuated by the purest and highest motives; but he still could not think that schools based upon so narrow and sectarian a foundation were proper institutions for training the youth of Ireland. Those who had petitioned against the changes in the rules did so because they deprecated any departure from the great principle of non-sectarian education in Ireland. At present children of all religions might be found sitting side by side in the schools. But if the rules as recently altered should be enforced, the whole country would be covered with hostile schools, in which children would be imbued with antagonistic feelings, and all the old intolerance and bigotry which he hoped had almost disappeared from Ireland would be revived. He would suggest that the best mode of dealing with this subject would be by the appointment of a Royal Commission, composed of persons unconnected with the system; and, although he would not pledge himself to agree with any conclusions they might arrive at, he would undertake to bow with respect to their determination, and would, as far as possible, urge upon those who agreed with him to do the same.

THE EARL OF BANDON said, the system of education as introduced by Lord Derby was on the principle of united education; and in very few of the non-vested schools could united education be said to exist. In his own county he had known instances where clergymen were anxious to put their schools under the National Board, and were prevented from doing so by their own Protestant parishioners. Having frequently assisted at collections made with charitable objects, he could testify to the zeal with which the very poorest classes subscribed to sustain the Church Education Society. The position in which the education of the children of the lower classes in Ireland was placed was, that while Roman Catholics in each parish had schools supported by the State, no Protestant child attended these schools. The Roman Catholic schools received support from the State, while assistance was refused to Protestant schools. He would ask their Lordships how long that anomaly was to continue? The religious scruples even of Jews were respected, but those of Irish Protestants were wholly disregarded. The National Board professed to carry out a mixed system of education, but in reality it was undermining that system. Nominated to please the Ultramontane party, and viewing the convent schools with the utmost favour, how was it likely that the Commissioners would do justice to the model schools of which the others were their rivals? If they made the convent schools model schools, the days of the National system were numbered. The National system was really carried out in the workhouses, where a lay Board mediated and did justice between the parties respectively; whereas in other schools, when complaints were made, the Commissioners too often sent back the matter for investigation by the priest, who was the patron of the school; in the same way the Lord Lieutenant, when appealed to as a Minister of the Crown, instead of deciding for himself, referred to the Commissioners for their view of what ought to be done. If they wished to maintain the National system they must totally abolish the Board, and appoint paid Commissioners and make them responsible to Parliament.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that great weight was to be attached to the views of the right rev. Prelate who had spoken on the subject (the Bishop of Down and Connor), although he had certainly failed to convince him that the course which he advocated was one which it would be desirable to adopt. In reference to the arguments of the two noble Lords opposite, he felt bound to remark that they had all along been the consistent, but uncompromising, opponents of the system of National Education in Ireland. It was but natural, therefore, that they should continue to object to it; but he, for one, must contend that one of the greatest benefits which could be conferred on Ireland was the promotion of education, and the National system had, he believed, answered the purpose. There was something besides, however, which would tend greatly to the advantage of the country—and that was the encouraging a spirit of harmony and conciliation on religious subjects; and the observations in which the noble Lords opposite had indulged were, he thought, scarcely calculated to forward that end. With respect to the composition of the National Board, the average attendance was about four Protestant to three Roman Catholic Members; and on the day when the rules in question were decided on the members of both persuasions were, so far as he was aware, equal in their numbers. In respect to the change of the rules, the speeches that had been made conveyed to their Lordships a very exaggerated view of them. He might observe that Lord Derby had—very properly he thought—given his sanction to the admission of convent schools to the benefits of the National system. They first received the capitation grant; but when afterwards the system of classification was introduced it was not found applicable to the convent schools, and they had hitherto received from the Government only about half what was given to other schools. That being so, the question lately brought before the Board was, that the age at which monitors were allowed to remain at the training schools being restricted to eighteen, and managers refusing to receive them at that age because of their youth, the result being that their services were lost to the country, and they adopted frequently other pursuits, it was desirable that those boys should be allowed to remain at the schools till they reached the age of twenty; the expense of which change would be about £2,000 a year, of which sum it was estimated only £500 would go to the convent schools. There was in that change, he thought, nothing to which objection could possibly be taken, while the interests of education were advanced by the step.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that the members of the Established Church in Ireland will hear with great regret that Her Majesty's Ministers sanction the change proposed in the Rules of the Commissioners of National Education. The speech of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Down and Connor) ought to have convinced them that a grave error had been committed, which it was their duty to rectify rather than to support. He (the Earl of Longford) and other persons had placed schools in connection with the National Board, on the faith of its published principles and published regulations. Its published principles were to the effect that no suspicion of proselytism should attach to the system, so that parents of all religious persuasions might send their children with confidence to the schools. Its published regulations were literally and verbally non-sectarian; but its practice had gradually become, and has now avowedly become, bitterly sectarian. He (the Earl of Longford) would not follow previous speakers through the series of changes, all in a direction hostile to the Established Church, which have been successively introduced into the system; but he added his protest to theirs against the unfortunate measure now under discussion, and regretted that the Ministry should approve an arrangement which he believed to be prejudicial to the cause of good government in Ireland.

INDIA—LUCKNOW BOOTY.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the booty taken at the Begum's Coote (Lucknow) in December, 1858, has been, or is to be, distributed among the troops by whom it was captured; and if the whole, or any portion of it, is to be so distributed, when the distribution is likely to take place?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied that the operations of the prize agents having been brought to a close, this property was held to belong to the Crown; and a proposal made by the Chief Commissioner of Oude, that a certain portion should be granted to the finders, was considered and approved by the Government of India in December, 1859. The distribution of this sum was left to Major General Sir Hope Grant.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN CLIVE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any steps are being taken to accelerate the distribution of the second instalment of Delhi Prize Money to claimants in

VOL. CLXXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

England, payment of such second instalment having been made in India in November, 1863?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that it was found that in the first distribution of this money several mistakes had been made in India, and instructions were sent out in order that those mistakes might be corrected. The amount of the second portion to be distributed could not be determined until that of the first had been ascertained. However, he had written out to India early in March with a view to accelerate the second distribution, but he had not yet received an answer to his despatch.

RELATIONS WITH BRAZIL.

QUESTION.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, what likelihood there is of a resumption of Diplomatic Relations between England and Brazil.

Mr. LAYARD replied, that negotiations were still going on, but he was unable to say when they would be completed.

INDIA—THE GAOL OF CALCUTTA.

QUESTION.

Mr. LESLIE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any foundation for the statements contained in the Letter of the Indian Correspondent of The Times which appeared in that paper on Friday last, regarding the condition of the great Gaol at Calcutta—

“That it is a den of iniquity, a sink of filth; that no one could inform the President of the Sanitary Commission how many prisoners died in the gaol; that the medical attendant could not say for certain what the mortality was; and that some prisoners have been murdered by the native gaolers in the attempt to extort bribes from them and their friends.”

And whether Her Majesty's Government will consent to lay upon the table of the House the Report of Mr. Strachey, the President of the Sanitary Commission, on the subject of Calcutta and other Indian Prisons?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, he had seen the statement to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention, and he could only say that it was very shocking, if true. He had received no information himself upon the subject, and therefore he was unable either to confirm or contradict the statement. It seemed, however, very improbable, for this reason, that under the existing Act Visiting Justices had been appointed, and it was the duty of one or more of those gentlemen, who were independent gentlemen of Calcutta, to visit the gaols three times in each quarter, and to make a Report as to their condition. In the last Report which he had received the Commissioners, after going into considerable detail as to the number of prisoners and other matters, said, "We beg to state that the management of the gaol appears to be satisfactory." Now, it was hardly likely, if such a state of things existed as the hon. Gentleman had referred to, that such a Report would have been made so recently as last winter, not by Government officials, but by independent gentlemen.

MR. LESLIE said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will make further inquiry?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Certainly. I apprehend if the statement in the letter quoted by the hon. Member be true, the Sanitary Commission which has been recently appointed for Bengal has already inquired into the state of the case. I am not in possession of the Report, but no doubt it will be sent.

DENMARK AND GERMANY — THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, in the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, he would beg to ask the Government, Whether any Circular Note or Despatch has been received by Her Majesty's Government from the Allied Powers, declaring they no longer consider themselves bound by the concessions made by them at the Conference; and whether any statement has been made by Austria, that the assertion made by Earl Russell that Austria will confine herself to the occupation of Schleswig and Holstein is erroneous?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, no circular note to that effect had been received.

MR. LAYARD said, in the latter part of the Question the word "occupation" was incorrect. The statement was that there was no "conquest" of Jutland.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any information that the German Powers are about to attack Copenhagen and the Islands?

MR. LAYARD: Not that I am aware.

Sir Charles Wood

THAMES EMBANKMENT AND METROPOLIS IMPROVEMENT (LOANS).

Resolutions [July 1] reported.

1. "That it is expedient to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to guarantee the repayment of any money that may be borrowed under the Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement Acts, together with the interest thereon; and to cause advances to be made out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of such sums as may be necessary for the repayment of such principal and interest, in aid of any other moneys applicable for that purpose under the said Act."

2. "That the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt be authorized to advance the money which by the Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement Acts the Metropolitan Board of Works is authorised to raise."

Resolutions agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and MR. PEEL.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE.

On Motion of MR. BARING, Bill to continue certain Turnpike Acts in Great Britain, ordered to be brought in by MR. BARING and SIR GEORGE GREY.

THE ALLEGED HOLY ALLIANCE.

OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON having moved that the Orders of the Day be postponed till after the notice of Motion relative to Denmark and Germany, said: I am bound to state to the House that we have received to-day a communication from the Prussian Ambassador with reference to the correspondence which has been published in one of the morning newspapers. I will not read the whole of the communication, but in it he says that since that newspaper has, notwithstanding the official denial which has been given, published despatches which are fabrications from beginning to end, and thinking that some question might be asked me in this House concerning them, he deems it his duty to tell me, "with all the authority of my official character, that, as far as my Government is concerned, all this pretended correspondence is a complete invention."

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed till after the Notice of Motion relative to Denmark and Germany.—
(Viscount Palmerston.)

CENSURE—

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker—Some of the longest and most disastrous wars of modern Europe have been wars of succession. The Thirty Years War was a war of succession. It arose from a dispute respecting the inheritance of a duchy in the north of Europe, not very distant from that Duchy of Holstein which now engages general attention. Sir, there are two causes why wars originating in disputed succession become usually of a prolonged and obstinate character. The first is internal discord, and the second foreign ambition. Sometimes a domestic party, under such circumstances, has an understanding with a foreign Potentate; and, again, the ambition of that foreign Potentate excites the distrust, perhaps the envy, of other Powers; and the consequence is, generally speaking, that the dissensions thus created lead to prolonged and complicated struggles. Sir, I apprehend—indeed, I entertain no doubt—that it was the contemplation of such circumstances possibly occurring in our time that the statesmen of Europe, some thirteen years ago, knowing that it was probable that the Royal line of Denmark would cease, and that upon the death of the then King his dominions would be divided, and in all probability disputed, gave their best consideration to obviate the recurrence of such calamities to Europe. Sir, in these days fortunately it is not possible for the Powers of Europe to act under such circumstances as they would have done a hundred years ago. Then they would probably have met in secret conclave and have decided the arrangement for the internal government of an independent kingdom. In our time they said to the King of Denmark, “If you and your people among yourselves can make an arrangement in the case of the contingency of your death without issue, which may put an end to all internal discord, we at least will do this for you and Denmark—we will in your lifetime recognize the settlement thus made, and, so far as the influence of the great Powers can be exercised, we will at least relieve you from the other great cause which, in the case of disputed successions, leads to prolonged wars. We will save you from foreign interference, foreign ambition, and foreign aggression.” That,

Sir, I believe, is an accurate account and true description of that celebrated Treaty of May, 1852, of which we have heard so much, and of which some characters are given which in my opinion are unauthorized and unfounded.

There can be no doubt that the purpose of that treaty was one which entitled it to the respect of the communities of Europe. Its language is simple and expresses its purpose. The Powers who concluded that treaty announced that they concluded it, not from their own will or arbitrary impulse, but at the invitation of the Danish Government, in order to give to the arrangements relative to the succession an additional pledge of stability by an act of European recognition. If hon. Gentlemen look to that treaty—and I doubt not they are familiar with it—they will find the first Article entirely occupied with the recitals of the efforts of the King of Denmark—and, in his mind, successful efforts—to make the necessary arrangements with the principal Estates and personages of his kingdom, in order to effect the requisite alterations in the lex regia regulating the order of succession; and the Article concludes by an invitation and appeal to the Powers of Europe, by a recognition of that settlement, to preserve his kingdom from the risk of external danger.

Sir, under that treaty England incurred no legal responsibility which was not equally entered into by France and by Russia. If, indeed, I were to dwell on moral obligations—which I think constitute too dangerous a theme to introduce into a debate of this kind—but if I were to dwell upon that topic, I might say that the moral obligations which France, for example, had incurred to Denmark were of no ordinary character. Denmark had been the ally of France in that severe struggle which forms the most considerable portion of modern history, and had proved a most faithful ally. Even at St. Helena, when contemplating his marvellous career and moralizing over the past, the first Emperor of the dynasty which now governs France rendered justice to the complete devotion of the Kings of Denmark and Saxony—the only Sovereigns, he said, who were faithful under all proof and the extreme of adversity. On the other hand, if we look to our relations with Denmark, in her we found a persevering, though a gallant foe. Therefore, so far as moral obligations are concerned, while there are none which should influence England, there is a great sense of gratitude which might have influenced the counsels of France. But, looking to the treaty, there is no legal obligation incurred by England towards Denmark which is not equally shared by Russia and by France.

Now, the question which I would first ask the House is this—How is it that, under these circumstances, the position of France relative to Denmark is one so free from embarrassment—I might say so dignified—that she recently received a tribute to her demeanour and unimpeachable conduct in this respect from Her Majesty's Secretary of State; while the position of England under the same obligation, contained in the same treaty, with relation to Denmark is one, all will admit, of infinite perplexity and, I am afraid I must add, terrible mortification? That, Sir, is the first question which I will put to the House, and which, I think, ought to receive a satisfactory answer, among other questions, to-night. And I think that the answer that must first occur to everyone—the logical inference—is that the affairs of this country with respect to our obligations under the Treaty of 1852 must have been very much mismanaged to have produced consequences so contrary to the position occupied by another Power equally bound with ourselves by that treaty.

Sir, this is not the first time, as the House is aware, that the dominions of the King of Denmark have been occupied by Austrian and Prussian armies. In the year 1848, when a great European insurrection occurred—I call it insurrection to distinguish it from revolution, for, though its action was very violent, its ultimate effect was almost nothing—but when the great European insurrection took place, there was no portion of Europe more influenced by it than Germany. There is scarcely a political constitution in Germany that was not changed at that period, and scarcely a throne that was not subverted. The King of Denmark, in his character of a Sovereign Prince of Germany, was affected by that great movement. The population of Germany, under the influence of peculiar excitement at that time, were impelled to redress the grievances, as they alleged them to be, of their fellow-countrymen in the dominions of the King of Denmark, who were his subjects. The Duchy of Holstein and the Duchy of Schleswig were invaded, a civil war was excited by ambitious Princes, and that territory was ultimately subjected to a decree of that Diet with which now we have become familiar. The office was delegated to the Austrian and Prussian armies to execute that decree, and they occupied, I believe, at one time the whole continental possessions of the King of Denmark. In 1851 tranquillity had been restored to Europe, and especially to Germany, and the troops of Austria and Prussia ultimately quitted the dominions of the King of Denmark. That they quitted them in consequence of the military prowess of the Danes—though that was far from inconsiderable—I do not pretend to say. They quitted the territory, I believe the truth to be, in consequence of the influence of Russia, at that time irresistible in Germany, and deservedly so, because she had interfered and established tranquillity; and Russia had expressed her opinion that the German forces should quit the dominions of the King of Denmark. They quitted the country, however, under certain conditions. A diplomatic correspondence had taken place between the King of Denmark and the Courts of Berlin and Vienna, and the King of Denmark in that correspondence entered into certain engagements, and those engagements undoubtedly were recommended to a certain degree by the wish, if possible, to remedy the abuses complained of, and also by the desire to find an honourable excuse for the relinquishment of his provinces by the German forces. The King of Denmark never fulfilled the engagements into which he then entered. Partly, I have no doubt, from negligence. We know that it is not the habit of mankind to perform disagreeable duties when pressure is withdrawn. But I have no doubt, and I believe the candid statement to be, that it arose in a great degree from the impracticable character of the engagements into which he had entered. That was in the year 1851.

In 1852, tranquillity then being entirely restored, the treaty of May, which regulated the succession, was negotiated. And I may remind hon. Members that in that treaty there is not the slightest reference to these engagements which the King of Denmark had entered into with the Diet of Germany, or with German Powers who were members of the Diet. Nevertheless, the consequence of that state of affairs was this—that though there was no international question respecting Denmark, and although the possible difficulties which might occur of an international character had been anticipated by the Treaty of 1852, still in respect to the King of Denmark's capacity as Duke of Holstein and a Sovereign German prince, a controversy arose between him and the Diet of Germany in consequence of those engagements, expressed in hitherto private and secret diplomatic correspondence carried on between him and certain German Courts. The House will understand that this was not an international question—it did not affect the public law of Europe; but it was a municipal, local, or, as we now call it, a Federal question. Notwithstanding that in reality it related only to the King of Denmark and the Diet of Germany, in time it attracted the attention of the Government of England and of the Ministers of the great Powers, signatories of the Treaty of 1852. For some period after the Treaty of 1852, very little was heard of this Federal question and the controversy between the Diet and the King of Denmark. After the exertions and exhaustion of the revolutionary years the question slept; but it did not die. Occasionally it gave signs of vitality; and as time proceeded, shortly—at least not very long after—the accession of the present Government to office, the controversy between the Diet and the King of Denmark assumed an appearance of very great life and acrimony.

Now, Her Majesty's Ministers thought it their duty to interfere in that controversy between the German Diet and the King of Denmark—a controversy strictly Federal and not international. Whether they were wise in taking that course appears very doubtful. My own impression is, and always has been, that it would have been much better to have left the Federal question between the Diet and the King to work itself out. Her Majesty's Ministers, however, were of opinion—and no doubt there is something to be said in favour of that opinion—that as the question, although Federal, was one which would probably lead to events which would make it international, it was wiser and better to interfere by anticipation, and prevent, if possible, the Federal execution ever taking place. The consequence of that extreme activity on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers is a mass of correspondence which has been placed on the table, and with which, I doubt not, many Gentlemen have some acquaintance, though they may have been more attracted and absorbed by the interest of the more modern correspondence which has, within the year, been presented to the House. Sir, I should not be doing justice to the Secretary of State if I did not bear testimony to the perseverance and extreme ingenuity with which he conducted that correspondence. The noble Lord the Secretary of State found in that business, no doubt, a subject genial to his nature—namely, drawing up Constitutions for the government of communities. The noble Lord, we know, is almost as celebrated as a statesman who flourished at the end of the last century for this peculiar talent. I will not criticize any of the lucubrations of the noble Lord at that time. I think his labours are well described in a passage in one of the despatches of a distinguished Swedish statesman—the present Prime Minister, if I am not mistaken—who, when he was called upon to consider a scheme of the English Government for the administration of Schleswig, which entered into minute details with a power and prolixity which could have been acquired only by a constitutional Minister, who had long served an apprenticeship in the House of Commons, said—

“Generally speaking, the monarchs of Europe have found it difficult to manage one Parliament, but I observe, to my surprise, that Lord Russell is of opinion that the King of Denmark will be able to manage four.”

The only remark I shall make on this folio volume of between 300 and 400 pages relating to the affairs of Schleswig and Holstein is this—I observe that the other Powers of Europe, who were equally interested in the matter, and equally bound to interfere—if being signatories to the Treaty of 1852 justified interference—did not interpose as the English Government did. That they disapproved the course taken by us I by no means assert. When we make a suggestion on the subject, they receive it with cold politeness; they have no objection to the course we announce we are going to follow, but confine themselves, with scarcely an exception, to this conduct on their part. The noble Lord acted differently. But it is really unnecessary for me to dwell on this part of the question—we may dismiss it from our minds, and I have touched on it only to complete the picture which I am bound to place befor the House—in consequence of events which very speedily occurred.

All this elaborate and, I may venture to say, not using the word offensively but accurately, pragmatical correspondence of the noble Lord on the affairs of Schleswig and Holstein was carried on in perfect ignorance on the part of the people of this country, who found very little interest in the subject; and even in Europe where affairs of diplomacy always attract more attention, little notice was taken of it. This correspondence, however, culminated in a celebrated despatch which appeared in the autumn of 1862, and then, for the first time, a very great effect was produced in Europe generally—certainly in Germany and France—and some interest began to be excited in England. Sir, the effect of the Secretary of State's management of these transactions had been this, that he had encouraged—I will not now stop to inquire whether intentionally or not, but it is a fact that he had encouraged—the views of what is called the German party in this controversy. That had been the effect of the noble Lord's general interference, but especially it was the result of the despatch which appeared in the autumn of 1862. But, Sir, something shortly and in consequence occurred which removed that impression. Germany being agitated on the subject, England at last, in 1863, having had her attention called to the case, which began to produce some disquietude, and Gentlemen in this House beginning to direct their attention to it, shortly before the prorogation of Parliament the state of affairs caused such a degree of public anxiety, that it was deemed necessary that an inquiry should be addressed to Her Majesty's Government on the subject, and that some means should be taken to settle the uneasiness which prevailed by obtaining from the Ministers a declaration of their policy generally with regard to Denmark. Sir, that appeal was not made, as I need hardly assure or even remind the House—for many were witnesses to it—in any party spirit, or in any way animated, I will say, by that disciplined arrangement with which public questions are by both sides of the House in general very properly brought before us. It was at the end of the Session, when few were left, and when the answer of Her Majesty's Ministers could not at all affect the position of parties, though it might be of inestimable interest and importance in its effect on the opinion of Europe, and on the course of events. That question was brought forward by an hon. Friend of mine (Mr. Seymour FitzGerald), who always speaks on these subjects with the authority of one who knows what he is talking about. Well, Sir, a communication was made to the noble Lord the First Minister on the subject, and it was understood on this side of the House, from the previous declarations of the noble Lord, and our experience of his career generally, that it was not an appeal which would be disagreeable to him, or one which he would have any desire to avoid. The noble Lord was not taken by surprise. He was communicated with privately, and he himself fixed the day—it was a morning sitting—when he would come down and explain the views of the Government in regard to our relations with Denmark. I am bound to say that the noble Lord spoke with all that perspicuity and complete detail with which he always treats diplomatic subjects, and in which we acknowledge him to be a master. The noble Lord entered into particulars, and gave to the House—who, with few exceptions, knew little about the matter—not only a popular, but generally an accurate account of the whole question. He described the constitution of the Diet itself. He explained, for the first time, in Parliament, what Federal Execution meant. The noble Lord was a little unhappy in his prophecy as to what was going to happen with regard to Federal Execution; but we are all liable to error when we prophesy, and it was the only mistake he made. The noble Lord said he did not think there would be a Federal Execution, and that if there were we might be perfectly easy in our minds, for it would not lead to any disturbance in Europe. The noble Lord also described the position of Holstein as a German Duchy, in which the King of Denmark was a Sovereign German Prince, and in that capacity a member of the Diet, and subject to the laws of the Diet. The Duchy of Schleswig, the noble Lord said, was not a German Duchy, and the moment it was interfered with, international considerations would arise. But the noble Lord informed us in the most re-assuring spirit that his views on our relations with Denmark were such as they had always been. I will quote the exact passage from the noble Lord's speech, not because it will not be familiar to the majority of those whom I am addressing, but because on an occasion like the present, one should refer to documents so that it may not be said afterwards that statements have been garbled or misrepresented. The noble Lord concluded his general observations in this manner—

“We are asked what is the policy and the course of Her Majesty’s Government respecting that dispute. We concur entirely with the hon. Gentleman (the Member for Horsham), and I am satisfied with all reasonable men in Europe, including those in France and Russia, in desiring that the independence, the integrity, and the rights of Denmark may be maintained. We are convinced—I am convinced at least—that if any violent attempt were made to overthrow those rights and interfere with that independence, those who made the attempt would find in the result that it would not be Denmark alone with which they would have to contend.” — [3 Hansard, clxxii. 1252.]

I say that is a clear, statesmanlike, and manly declaration of policy. It was not a hurried or hasty expression of opinion, because on a subject of that importance and that character the noble Lord never makes a hasty expression of opinion. He was master of the subject and could not be taken by surprise. But on that occasion there was no chance of his being taken by surprise. The occasion was arranged. The noble Lord was perfectly informed of what our object on this side was. The noble Lord sympathized with it. He wanted the disquietude of the public mind in England, and on the Continent especially, to be soothed and satisfied, and he knew that he could not arrive at such a desirable result more happily and more completely than by a frank exposition of the policy of the Government.

Sir, it is my business to-night to vindicate the noble Lord from those who have treated this declaration of policy as one used only to amuse the House of Commons. I am here to prove the sincerity of that declaration. It is long since the speech of the noble Lord was delivered, and we have now upon our table the diplomatic correspondence which was then carrying on by Her Majesty’s Government on the subject. It was then secret—it is now known to us all; and I will show you what at that very time was the tone of the Secretary of State in addressing the Courts of Germany mainly interested in the question. I will show how entirely and how heartily the secret efforts of the Government were exercised in order to carry into effect the policy which was publicly in the House of Commons announced by the noble Lord. I think it must have been very late in July that the noble Lord spoke—upon the 23rd, I believe—and I have here the despatches which, nearly at the same period, were sending by the Secretary of State to the German Courts. For example, hear how, on the 31st of July, the Secretary of State writes to Lord Bloomfield at Vienna—

“You will tell Count Rechberg that if Germany persists in confounding Schleswig with Holstein, other Powers of Europe may confound Holstein with Schleswig, and deny the right of Germany to interfere with the one any more than she has with the other, except as a European Power. Such a pretension might be as dangerous to the independence and integrity of Germany as the invasion of Schleswig might be to the independence and integrity of Denmark.”—Denmark and Germany, No. 2, 115.

And what is the answer of Lord Bloomfield? On the 6th of August, after having communicated with Count Rechberg, he writes—

“Before leaving his Excellency I informed him that the Swedish Government would not remain indifferent to a Federal Execution in Holstein, and that this measure of the Diet, if persisted in, might have serious consequences in Europe.”—p. 117.

I am showing how sincere the policy of the noble Lord was, and that the speech which we have been told was mainly for the House of Commons was really the policy of Her Majesty’s Government. Well, that was to Austria. Let us now see what was the despatch to Prussia. In the next month Earl Russell writes to our Minister at the Prussian Court:—

“I have caused the Prussian Chargé d’Affaires to be informed that if Austria and Prussia persist in advising the Confederation to make a Federal Execution now, they will do so against the advice already given by Her Majesty’s Government, and must be responsible for the consequences, whatever they may be. The Diet should bear in mind that there is a material difference between the political bearing of a military occupation of a territory which is purely and solely a portion of the Confederation, and the invasion of a territory which, although part of the German Confederation, is also portion of the territory of an independent Sovereign, whose dominions are counted as an element in the balance of power in Europe.”

I have now shown the House what was the real policy of the Government with respect to our relations with Denmark when Parliament was prorogued, and I have also shown that the speech of the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown was echoed by the Secretary of State to Austria and Prussia. I have shown, therefore, that it was a sincere policy, as announced by the noble Lord. I will now show that it was a wise and a judicious policy.

Sir, the noble Lord having made this statement to the House of Commons, the House was disbanded, the Members went into the country with perfect tranquillity of mind respecting these affairs of Denmark and Germany. The speech of the noble Lord re-assured the country, and gave them confidence that the noble Lord knew what he was about. And the noble Lord knew that we had a right to be confident in the policy he had announced, because at that period the noble Lord was aware that France was perfectly ready to co-operate with Her Majesty's Government in any measure which they thought proper to adopt with respect to the vexed transactions between Denmark and Germany. Nay, France was not only ready to co-operate, but she spontaneously offered to act with us in any way we desired. The noble Lord made his speech at the end of July—I think the 23rd of July—and it is very important to know what at that moment were our relations with France in reference to this subject. I find in the Correspondence on the table a despatch from Lord Cowley, dated July the 31st. The speech of the noble Lord having been made on the 23rd, this is a despatch written upon the same subject on the 31st. Speaking of the affairs of Germany and Denmark, Lord Cowley writes—

"M. Drouyn de Lhuys expressed himself as desirous of acting in concert with Her Majesty's Government in this matter."

I have now placed before the House the real policy of the Government at the time Parliament was prorogued last year. I have shown you that it was a sincere policy when expressed by the noble Lord. I have shown that it was a sound and judicious policy, because Her Majesty's Government was then conscious that France was ready to co-operate with this country, France having expressed its desire to aid us in the settlement of this question. Well, Sir, at the end of the summer of last year, and at the commencement of the autumn, after the speeches and despatches of the First Minister and the Secretary of State, and after, at the end of July, that re-assuring announcement from the French Government, there was great excitement in Germany. The German people have been for some time painfully conscious that they do not exercise that influence in Europe which they believe is due to the merits, moral, intellectual and physical, of forty millions of population, homogeneous and speaking the same language. During the summer of last year this feeling was displayed in a remarkable manner, and it led to the meeting at Frankfort, which has not been hitherto mentioned in reference to these negotiations, but which was in reality a very significant affair. The German people at that moment found the old question of Denmark—the relations between Denmark and the Diet—to be the only practical question upon which they could exhibit their love of a United Fatherland and their sympathy with a kindred race who were subjects of a Foreign Prince. Therefore there was very great excitement in Germany on the subject; and to those who are not completely acquainted with the German character, and who take for granted that the theories they put forth are all to be carried into action, there were no doubt many symptoms which were calculated to alarm the Cabinet. Her Majesty's Government, firm in their policy, firm in their ally, knowing that the moderate counsels, urged by France and England in a spirit which was sincere and which could not be mistaken, must ultimately lead to some conciliatory arrangements between the King of Denmark and the Diet, I suppose did not much disquiet themselves respecting the agitation in Germany. But towards the end of the summer and the commencement of the autumn—in the month of September—after the meeting at Frankfort and after other circumstances, the noble Lord the Secretary of State, as a prudent man—a wise, cautious, and prudent Minister—thought it would be just as well to take time by the forelock, to prepare for emergencies, and to remind his allies at Paris of the kind and spontaneous expression on their part of their desire to co-operate with him in arranging this business—I think it was on the 16th of September that Lord Russell, the Secretary of State, applied in this language to our Minister at Paris—our Ambassador (Lord Cowley) being at that time absent—

"As it might produce some danger to the balance of power especially if the integrity and independence of Denmark were in any way impaired by the demands of Germany and the measures consequent thereupon if the Government of the Emperor of the French are of opinion that any benefit would be likely to follow from an offer of good services on the part of Great Britain and France, Her Majesty's Government would be ready to take that course. If, however, the Government of France would consider such a step as likely to be unavailing, the two Powers might remind Austria, Prussia, and the Diet that any act on their part tending to weaken the integrity and independence of Denmark would be at variance with the Treaty of the 8th of May, 1852."—No. 2, 180.

Sir, I think that was a very prudent step on the part of the Secretary of State. It was virtually a reminder of the offer which France had made some months before. Yet, to the surprise, and entirely to the discomfiture of Her Majesty's Government, this application was received at first with coldness, and afterwards with absolute refusal.

Well, Sir, I pause now to inquire what had occasioned this change in the relations between the two Courts. Why was France, which at the end of the Session of Parliament was so heartily with England and so approving the policy of the noble Lord with respect to Denmark and Germany that she voluntarily offered to act with us in endeavouring to settle the question—why was France two or three months afterwards so entirely changed? Why was she so cold, and ultimately in the painful position of declining to act with us? I stop for a moment my examination of this Correspondence to look for the causes of this change of feeling, and I believe they may be easily discerned.

Sir, at the commencement of last year an insurrection broke out in Poland. Unhappily, insurrection in Poland is not an unprecedented event. This insurrection was extensive and menacing; but there had been insurrections in Poland before quite as extensive and far more menacing—the insurrection of 1831, for example, for at that time Poland possessed a national army second to none for valour and discipline. Well, Sir, the Question of the Polish Insurrection in 1831 was a subject of deep consideration with the English Government of that day. They went thoroughly into the matter; they took the soundings of that question; it was investigated maturely, and the Government of King William the Fourth arrived at these two conclusions—first, that it was not expedient for England to go to war for the restoration of Poland; and second, that if England was not prepared to go to war, any interference of another kind on her part would only aggravate the calamities of that fated people. These were the conclusions at which the Government of Lord Grey arrived, and they were announced to Parliament. This is a question which the English Government has had more than one opportunity of considering—and in every instance they considered it fully and completely. It recurred again in the year 1855, when a Conference was sitting at Vienna in the midst of the Russian war, and again the English Government—the Government of the Queen—had to deal with the subject of Poland. It was considered by them under the most favourable circumstances for Poland, for we were at war then, and at war with Russia. But after performing all the duties of a responsible Ministry on that occasion, Her Majesty's Government arrived at these conclusions—first, that it was not only not expedient for England to go to war to restore Poland, but that it was not expedient even to prolong a war for that object; and, in the next place, that any interference with a view to provoke a war in Poland without action on our part, was not just to the Poles, and must only tend to bring upon them increased disasters. I say, therefore, that this question of Poland in the present century, and within the last thirty-four years, has been twice considered by different Governments; and when I remind the House that on its consideration by the Cabinet of Lord Grey in 1831 the individual who filled the office of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and who, of course, greatly guided the opinion of his Colleagues on such a question, was the noble Lord the present First Minister of the Crown, and when I also remind the House that the British Plenipotentiary at the Conference of Vienna in 1855, on whose responsibility in a great degree the decision then come to was arrived at, is the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I think that England, when the great difficulties of last year with respect to Poland occurred, had a right to congratulate herself that, in a situation of such gravity, and at an emergency when a mistake might produce incalculable evils, her fortunes were regulated not only by two statesmen of such great ability and experience, but by statesmen who, on this subject, possessed peculiar advantages, who had thoroughly entered into the question, who knew all its issues, all the contingencies that might possibly arise in its management, and who on the two previous occasions on which it had been submitted to the consideration of England, had been the guiding Ministers to determine her to a wise course of action.

[First Night.]

Now, I must observe that what is called the Polish question occupies a different position in France from that which it occupies in England. I will not admit that, in deep sympathy with the Poles, the French are superior to the English people. I believe I am only stating accurately the feelings of this country when I say that among men of all classes there is no modern event which is looked back to with more regret than the partition of Poland. It is universally acknowledged by them to be one of the darkest pages of the history of the Eighteenth century. But in France the Polish question is not a question which merely interests the sentiments of the millions. It is a political question, and a political question of the very highest importance—a question which interests Ministers, and Cabinets, and Princes. There is a belief in France which has made the restoration of Poland a traditional policy of that country—a belief that its restoration would add to the power and glory of France. In France it is also a practical question, because there are men even now alive in France who remember that the French eagles have floated over the ancient capitals of Poland; if they remember it with some degree of pride I should think they must likewise remember it with some degree of remorse, when they recollect the opportunity they let pass. The House must therefore bear in mind that when an insurrection occurs in Poland it is a very different affair in France from what it is in England. It is not an affair which merely interests the frequenters of cafés and casinos—it at once comes home to Ministers, Cabinets, and Princes. Well, the ruler of France, a sagacious Prince and a lover of peace, as the Secretary of State has just informed us, was of course perfectly alive to the grave issues involved in what is called the Polish question. But the Emperor knew perfectly well that England had already had opportunities of considering it in the completest manner, and had arrived at a settled conclusion with regard to it. Therefore, with characteristic caution, he exercised great reserve, and held out little encouragement to the representatives of the Polish people. He knew well that in 1855 he himself, our ally—and with us a conquering ally—had urged this question on the English Government, and that, under the most favourable circumstances for the restoration of Poland, we had adhered to our traditional policy, neither to go to war nor to interfere. Therefore, the French Government exhibited a wise reserve on the subject. But after a short time, what must have been the astonishment of the Emperor of the French when he found the English Government embracing the cause of Poland with extraordinary ardour! The noble Lord the Secretary of State and the noble Lord the First Minister, but especially the former, announced this policy as if it were a policy new to the consideration of statesmen and likely to lead to immense results. He absolutely served a notice to quit on the Emperor of Russia. He sent a copy of this despatch to all the Courts of Europe which were signatories of the Treaty of Vienna and invited them to follow his example. From the King of Portugal down to the King of Sweden, there was not a signatory of that treaty who was not, as it were, clattering at the palace gates of St. Petersburg, and calling the Czar to account respecting the affairs of Poland. For three months Europe generally believed that there was to be a war on a great scale, of which the restoration of Poland was to be one of the main objects. Is it at all remarkable that the French Government and the French people, cautious as they were before, should have responded to such invitations and such stimulating proposals? We know how the noble Lord fooled them to the top of their bent. The House recollects the six propositions to which the attention of the Emperor of Russia was called in the most peremptory manner. The House recollects the closing scene, when it was arranged that the Ambassadors of France, Austria, and England, should on the very same day appear at the hotel of the Minister of Russia and present Notes ending with three identical paragraphs to show the agreement of the Powers. An impression pervaded Europe that there was to be a general war, and that England, France, and Austria were united to restore Poland. The House remembers the end of all this—it remembers the reply of the Russian Minister, couched in a tone of haughty sarcasm and of indignation that deigned to be ironical. There was then but one step to take according to the views of the French Government, and that was action. They appealed to that England which had itself thus set the example of agitation on the subject; and England, wisely as I think, resorted to her traditionary policy, the Government confessing that it was a momentary indiscretion which had animated her councils for three or four months; that they never meant anything more than words; and a month afterwards, I believe, they sent to St. Petersburg an obscure despatch, which may be described as an apology. But this did not alter the position of the French Government and the French Emperor. The Emperor had been induced by us to hold out promises which he could not fulfil. He was placed in a false position towards both the people of Poland and the people of France; and, therefore, Sir, I am not surprised that when the noble Lord the Secretary of State, a little alarmed by the progress of affairs in Germany, thought it discreet to reconnoitre his position on the 17th of September, he should have been received at Paris with coldness, and, ultimately, that his despatch should have been answered in this manner.

I fear that I may weary the House with my narrative, but I will not abuse the privilege of reading extracts, which is generally very foreign to my desire. Yet, on a question of this kind it is better to have the documents, and not lay oneself open to the charge of garbling. Mr. Grey, writing to Lord Russell on the 18th of September, 1863, says—

“The second mode of proceeding suggested by your Lordship—namely, ‘To remind Austria, Prussia, and the German Diet that any acts on their part tending to weaken the integrity and independence of Denmark, would be at variance with the Treaty of the 8th of May, 1852,’ would be in a great measure analogous to the course pursued by Great Britain and France in the Polish question. He had no inclination (and he frankly avowed that he should so speak to the Emperor) to place France in the same position with reference to Germany as she had been placed with regard to Russia. The formal notes addressed by the three Powers to Russia had received an answer which literally meant nothing, and the position in which those three great Powers were now placed was anything but dignified; and if England and France were to address such a reminder as that proposed to Austria, Prussia, and the German Confederation, they must be prepared to go further, and to adopt a course of action more in accordance with the dignity of two great Powers than they were now doing in the Polish question. . . . Unless Her Majesty’s Government was prepared to go further, if necessary, than the mere presentation of a note, and the receipt of an evasive reply, he was sure the Emperor would not consent to adopt your Lordship’s suggestion.”—No. 2, 131.

Well, Sir, that was an intimation to the noble Lord with respect to the change in the relations between England and France that was significant—I think it was one

(that the noble Lord should have duly weighed—and when he remembered the position which this country occupied with regard to Denmark—that it was a position under the treaty which did not bind us to interfere more than France itself—conscious, at the same time, that any co-operation from Russia in the same cause could hardly be counted upon—I should have said that a prudent Government would have well considered that position, and that they would not have taken any course which committed them too strongly to any decided line of action. But so far as I can judge from the Correspondence before us, that was not the tone taken by Her Majesty’s Government—because here we have extracts from the Correspondence of the Secretary of State to the Swedish Minister, to the Diet at Frankfort, and a most important despatch to Lord Bloomfield, all in the fortnight that elapsed after the receipt of the despatch of Mr. Grey that notified the change in the feeling of the French Government. It is highly instructive that we should know what effect that produced in the system and policy of Her Majesty’s Government. Immediately—almost the day after the receipt of that despatch—the Secretary of State wrote to the Swedish Minister—

“Her Majesty’s Government set the highest value on the independence and integrity of Denmark. . . . Her Majesty’s Government will be ready to remind Austria and Prussia of their treaty obligations to respect the integrity and independence of Denmark.”—No. 2, 137-8.

Then on the 29th of September—that is, only nine or ten days after the receipt of the French despatch—we have this most important despatch, which I shall read at some little length. It is at page 136, and is really addressed to the Diet. The Secretary of State says—

“Her Majesty’s Government by the Treaty of London, of May 8, 1852, is bound to respect the integrity and independence of Denmark. The Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia have taken the same engagement. Her Majesty could not see with indifference a military occupation of Holstein, which is only to cease on terms injuriously affecting the constitution of the whole Danish Monarchy. Her Majesty’s Government could not recognize this military occupation as a legitimate exercise of the powers of the Confederation, or admit that it could properly be called a Federal Execution. Her Majesty’s Government could not be indifferent to the bearing of such an act upon Denmark and upon European interests. Her Majesty’s Government therefore earnestly entreat the German Diet to pause and to submit the questions in dispute between Germany and Denmark to the mediation of other Powers unconcerned in the controversy, but deeply concerned in the maintenance of the peace of Europe and the independence of Denmark."—No. 2, 145.

My object in reading this despatch is to show that, after the indication of the change of feeling on the part of France, the policy—the sincere policy—of the Government was not modified. The Secretary of State writes thus on the 30th of September to Lord Bloomfield at Vienna—

"Her Majesty's Government trust that no act of Federal Execution to which Austria may be a party, and no act of war against Denmark on the ground of the affairs of Schleswig, will be allowed to clash with this primary and essential treaty obligation. Her Majesty's Government indeed entertain a full confidence that the Government of Austria is as deeply impressed as Her Majesty's Government with the conviction that the independence and integrity of Denmark form an essential element in the balance of power in Europe."—No. 3, 147.

Now, this takes us to the end of September; and I think the House up to this time tolerably clearly understands the course of the Correspondence. Nothing of any importance happened in October that requires me to pause and consider it. We arrive, then, at the month of November, and now approach very important and critical affairs. The month of November was remarkable for the occurrence of two great events which completely changed the character and immensely affected the aspect of the whole relations between Denmark and Germany, and which produced consequences which none of us may see the end of. Early in November the Emperor of the French proposed a European Congress. His position was such—as he himself has described it there can be no indelicacy in saying so—his position had become painful from various causes, but mainly from the manner in which he had misapprehended the conduct of the English Government with regard to Poland. He saw great troubles about to occur in Europe; he wished to anticipate their settlement; he felt himself in a false position with respect to his own subjects, because he had experienced a great diplomatic discomfiture; but he was desirous—and there is no doubt of the sincerity of the declaration—he was desirous of still taking a course which should restore and retain the cordial understanding with this country. He proposed then a general Congress. Well—when Parliament met on the 4th of February I had to make certain observations on the general condition of affairs, and I gave my opinion as to the propriety of Her Majesty's Government refusing to be a party to that Congress. Generally speaking, I think that a Congress should not precede action. If you wish any happy and permanent results from a Congress, it should rather follow the great efforts of nations; and, when they are somewhat exhausted, give them the opportunity of an honourable settlement. Sir, I did not think it my duty to conceal my opinion, Her Majesty's Government having admitted that they had felt it their duty to refuse a proposition of that character. I should have felt that I was wanting in that ingenuousness and fair play in politics which I hope, whoever sits on that bench or this, we shall always pursue; if, when the true interests of the country are concerned, agreeing as I did with the Government, I did not express frankly that opinion. But, Sir, I am bound to say that had I been aware of what has been communicated to us by the papers on the table—had I been aware, when I spoke on the 4th of February, that only a week before Parliament met—that only a week before we were assured by a Speech from the Throne that Her Majesty was continuing to carry on negotiations in the interest of peace—that Her Majesty's Government had made a proposition to France which must inevitably have produced, if accepted, a great European war, I should have given my approbation in terms much more qualified.

But, Sir, whatever difference of opinion there might be as to the propriety or impropriety of Her Majesty's Government acceding to the Congress, I think there were not then—I am sure there are not now—two opinions as to the mode and manner in which that refusal was conveyed. Sir, when the noble Lord vindicated that curt and, as I conceive, most offensive reply, he dilated, the other night on the straightforwardness of British Ministers, and said, that by whatever else their language might be characterized, it was distinguished by candour and clearness, and that even where it might be charged with being coarse it at least conveyed a determinate meaning. Well, Sir, I wish that if our diplomatic language is characterized by clearness and straightforwardness, some of that spirit had distinguished the despatches and declarations addressed by the noble Lord to the Court of Denmark. It is a great pity that we did not have a little of that rude frankness when the fortunes of that ancient kingdom were at stake.

But, Sir, another event of which I must now remind the House happened about that time. In November the King of Denmark died. The death of the King of Denmark entirely changed the character of the question between Germany and Denmark. The question was a Federal question before, as the noble Lord, from the despatches I have read, was perfectly aware; but by the death of the King of Denmark it became an international question, because the controversy of the King of Denmark was with the Diet of Germany, which had not recognized the change in the Lex Regia, or the changes in the succession to the various dominions of the King. It was, therefore, an international question of magnitude and of a menacing character. Under these circumstances, when the question became European, when the difficulties were immensely magnified and multiplied—the offer of a Congress having been made on the 5th of November, and not refused until the 27th—the King of Denmark having died on the 16th—it was, I say, with a complete knowledge of the increased risk and of the increased dimensions of the interests at stake, that the noble Lord sent that answer to the invitation of the Emperor of the French—I say, Sir, that at this moment it became the Government of England seriously to consider their position. With the offer of the Congress, and with the death of the King of Denmark—with these two remarkable events before the noble Lord's eyes, it is my duty to remind the House of the manner in which the noble Lord the Secretary of State addressed the European Powers. Neither of these great events seems to have induced the noble Lord to modify his tone. On the 19th of November, the King having just died, the Secretary of State writes to Sir Alexander Malet, our Minister to the Diet, to remind him that all the Powers of Europe had agreed to the Treaty of 1852. On the 20th, he writes a letter of menace to the German Powers saying that Her Majesty's Government expect, as a matter of course, that all the Powers will recognize the succession of the King of Denmark as heir of all the States which, according to the Treaty of London, were united under the sceptre of the late King. And on the 23rd, four days before he refused the invitation to the Congress, he writes to Lord Bloomfield—right to interfere on behalf of Denmark if the troops of the Confederation should enter Holstein on Federal grounds. But if Execution were enforced on international grounds, the Powers who signed the Treaty of 1852 would have a right to interfere."—No. 3, 230.

To Sir Augustus Paget, our Minister at Copenhagen, on November 30—the House will recollect that this was after he had refused the Congress, after the King had died, and after the question had become an international one—he writes announcing his refusal of the Congress, and proposes the sole mediation of England. Then he writes to Sir Alexander Malet in the same month, that Her Majesty's Government can only leave to Germany the sole responsibility of raising a war in Europe, which the Diet seemed bent on making. That is the tone which the Government adopted, after the consideration, as we are bound to believe, which the question demanded—after having incurred the responsibility of refusing the Congress offered by the Emperor of the French, after the death of the King of Denmark, after the question had been changed from a Federal into an international one, such, I repeat, is the tone they took up, and in which they sent their menacing messages to every Court in Germany—I say that at the death of the King of Denmark it behoved Her Majesty's Ministers, instead of adopting such a course, maturely to consider their position in relation to the events which had occurred. There were two courses open to Her Majesty's Government—both intelligible, both honourable. It was open to them, after the death of the King of Denmark to have acted, as France had resolved under the same circumstances to act—France, who occupies, we are told, a position in reference to these matters so dignified and satisfactory that it has received the compliments even of a baffled Minister. That course was frankly announced shortly afterwards to the English Minister by the Minister of France in Denmark. On the 19th November, General Fleury said to Lord Wodehouse at Copenhagen—

"That his own instructions from the Emperor were not to take part in any negotiations here, but to tell the Danish Government explicitly that, if Denmark became involved in a war with Germany, France would not come to her assistance."

If England had adopted that course, it would have been intelligible and honourable. We were not bound by the Treaty of 1852, to go to the assistance of Denmark if she became involved in a war with Germany. No one pretends that we were. As a matter of high policy—much as we may regret any disturbance in the territorial limits of Europe—being a country the policy of which is a policy of tranquillity and peace—there were no adequate considerations which could have justified England in entering into an extensive European war, without allies to prevent a war between Denmark and Germany. That was, I say, an honourable and intelligible course.

There was another course equally intelligible and equally honourable. Though I am bound to say that the course which I should have recommended the country to take would have been to adopt the same position as that of France, yet, if the Government really entertained the views with respect to the balance of power which have been expressed occasionally in this House by the noble Lord, and in a literary form by the Secretary of State—from which I may say I disagree, because they appear to me to be founded on the obsolete tradition of an antiquated system, and because I think that the elements from which we ought to form an opinion as to the distribution of the power of the world must be collected from a much more extensive area, and must be formed of larger and more varied elements—but let that pass—yet I say, if Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that the balance of power was endangered by a quarrel between Germany and Denmark, they were justified in giving their advice to Denmark, in threatening Germany, and in taking the general management of the affairs of Denmark; but they were bound, if a war did take place between Germany and Denmark, to support Denmark. Instead of that, they invented a process of conduct which I hope is not easily exemplified in the history of this country, and which I can only describe in one sentence—it consisted of menaces never accomplished and promises never fulfilled. With all these difficulties they never hesitate in their tone. At least, let us do them this justice—there never were, in semblance, more determined Ministers. They seemed at least to rejoice in the phantom of a proud courage. But what do they do? They send a special envoy to Denmark who was to enforce their policy and arrange everything. Formally the special Envoy was sent to congratulate the King on his accession to the Throne of Denmark—and all the other Powers did the same—but in reality the mission of Lord Wodehouse was for greater objects than that, and his instructions are before us in full. Without wearying the House by reading the whole of those instructions, I will read one paragraph, which is the last, and which is as it were a summary of the whole. They were written at the end of December. Recollect, this is the policy of the Government after refusing the Congress, and after the death of the King of Denmark—which had, therefore, incurred a still deeper responsibility, and which one must suppose had deeply considered all the issues involved. This is the cream of the instructions given by the Government to Lord Wodehouse—

“The result to be arrived at is the fulfilment of the Treaty of May 8, 1852, and of the engagements entered into by Prussia and Austria and Denmark in 1851-2.”—No. 3, 353.

Lord Wodehouse could not possibly be at fault as to what he was to do when he arrived at his destination. His was, no doubt, a significant appointment. He was a statesman of some experience; he had held a subordinate but important position in the administration of our foreign affairs; he had been a Minister at a Northern Court; he had recently distinguished himself in Parliament by a speech on the question of Germany and Denmark, in which he took a decidedly Danish view. Lord Wodehouse received clear instructions as to what he was to do. But, at the same time, what was the conduct of the Secretary of State? While Lord Wodehouse was repairing to his post did the Secretary of State in the least falter in his tone? It was about this time that the great diplomatic reprimand was sent to Sir Alexander Malleson for having talked of the “Protocol” of 1852 instead of the “Treaty.” This was the time that instructions were sent out that if anybody had the hardihood to mention the “Protocol” of '52 they were immediately to be stopped. However elevated their position might be, even if it were M. Bismarck himself, they were to be pulled up directly, in the full flow of their eloquence; note was to be taken of this great diplomatic lapse, and the Minister was to telegraph instantly home to his Government how he had carried out his instructions in this respect. On the 17th of December the noble Lord thus wrote to Sir Andrew Buchanan, our Ambassador at Berlin—

"Let it suffice at present for Her Majesty's Government to declare that they would consider any departure from the Treaty of Succession of 1852, by Powers who signed or acceded to that treaty, as entirely inconsistent with good faith."—No. 3, 383.

Similar despatches were sent to Wurtemberg, Hanover, and Saxony. On the 23rd of December the noble Earl wrote to Sir Andrew Buchanan—

"If the overthrow of the dynasty now reigning in Denmark is sought by Germany the most serious consequences may ensue."—No. 3, 411.

[Cheers.] I want to know what hon. Members mean by cheering the words I have just quoted. If you wish to convey even to a little Power that if it does a certain thing you will go to war with it, you take care not to announce your intention in an offensive manner; because, were you to do so, probably, even the smallest Power in Europe would not yield. And certainly if you wish to tell a great Power in Europe what may be eventually the consequences if it should adopt a different line from that which you desire, you would not abruptly declare that if it declined to accede to your wish you would declare war. Why, there are no despatches on record in the world—there is no record in any Foreign Office of language of this kind. The question is, what interpretation can be put on these threats. The Secretary of State writes again on the 25th of December to Sir Andrew Buchanan, stating that—

"Any precipitate action on the part of the German Confederation may lead to consequences fatal to the peace of Europe, and may involve Germany, in particular, in difficulties of a most serious nature."—No. 4, 414.

On the 26th of December the Secretary of State writes to Sir Alexander Malet and sends him a copy of the Treaty of 1852, in order that he may communicate it to the Diet. Now, that is the state of affairs after the King of Denmark's death—after he had been perfectly acquainted with the policy of France; after he had been frankly told that the French Emperor had explicitly informed Denmark that if she got involved in war with Germany France would not come to her assistance. Now, the words "if she went to war" might have been interpreted in two ways; because she might get into war without any fault of her own, and Germany might be the aggressor; but there could be no mistake in regard to the words "if she became involved in war." Neither Denmark nor England could make any mistake in regard to the policy of France, which the Secretary of State now says was a magnanimous policy.

Notwithstanding these threats, notwithstanding these repeated menaces, and notwithstanding every effort made by Her Majesty's Government to prevent it, Federal Execution took place, as it was intended to take place. One day after the most menacing epistle which I have ever read—the day after the copy of the Treaty of 1852 had been solemnly placed before the Diet by Sir Alexander Malet—on the 27th of December, Federal Execution took place. At any rate, I do not think that is evidence of the just influence of England in the counsels of Germany.

What was the course of Her Majesty's Government at this critical conjuncture? Why, Sir, they went again to France. After all that had happened their only expedient was to go and supplicate France. I will read the letter. [Mr. LAYARD: Hear, hear!] The hon. Gentleman seems to triumph in the recollection of mistakes and disappointments. I will give him the date, but I should think it must really be seared upon his conscience. The 27th of December is the date of the Federal execution; and Her Majesty's Government must have been in a state of complete panic, because on the 28th they make application to France, which is answered in a few hours by Lord Cowley:—"I said Her Majesty's Government were most sincerely anxious to—" [Laughter] I wish really to be candid, not to misrepresent anything, and to put the case before the House without garbling any of the despatches—"I said that Her Majesty's Government were most sincerely anxious to act with the Imperial Government in this question." No doubt they were. I am vindicating your conduct. I believe in your sincerity throughout. It is only your intense incapacity that I denounce. The passage in the Despatch is Shakspearean; it is one of those dramatic descriptions which only a masterly pen could accomplish. Lord Cowley went on—

"Her Majesty's Government felt that if the two Powers could agree war might be avoided, otherwise the danger of war was imminent. M. Drouyn de Lhuys said he partook this opinion; but as his Excellency made no further observation I remarked it would be a grievous thing if the difference of opinion which had arisen upon the merits of a general Congress were to produce an estrangement which would leave each Government to pursue its own course. I hoped that this would not be the case. Her Majesty's Government would do all in their power to avoid it.

[First Night.]

I presumed I might give them the assurance that the Imperial Government were not decided to reject the notion of a Conference?"—No. 4, 444.

Well, Sir, this received a curt and unsatisfactory reply. Nothing could be obtained from that plaintive appeal of Lord Cowley. Well, what did Her Majesty's Government do? Having received information that the threat of Federal execution had been fulfilled, having appealed to France, and been treated in the manner I have described, what did the Government do? Why, the Secretary of State within twenty-four hours afterwards, penned the fiercest despatch he had ever yet written. It is dated December 31, 1863, and it is addressed to Sir Andrew Buchanan—

"Her Majesty's Government do not hold that war would relieve Prussia from the obligations of the Treaty of 1852. The King of Denmark would by that treaty be entitled still to be acknowledged as the Sovereign of all the dominions of the late King of Denmark. He has been so entitled from the time of the death of the late King. A war of conquest undertaken by Germany avowedly for the purpose of adding some parts of the Danish dominions to the territory of the German Confederation might, if successful, alter the state of possession contemplated by the Treaty of London, and give to Germany a title by conquest to parts of the dominions of the King of Denmark. The prospect of such an accession may no doubt be a temptation to those who think it can be accomplished; but Her Majesty's Government cannot believe that Prussia will depart from the straight line of good faith in order to assist in carrying such a project into effect."—No. 4, 445.

[Ministerial cheers.] You cheer as if it were a surprising thing that the Secretary of State should have written a single sentence of common sense. These are important State documents, and I hope Her Majesty's Government are not so fallen that there is not a Minister among them who is able to write a despatch—I do not say a bad despatch, but a very important one. I wish to call attention to its importance—

"If German nationality in Holstein, and partially in Schleswig, were made the ground of the dismemberment of Denmark, Polish nationality in the Duchy of Posen would be a ground equally strong for the dismemberment of Prussia. It appears to Her Majesty's Government that the safest course for Prussia to pursue is to act with good faith and honour, and to stand by and fulfil her treaty engagements. By such a course she will command the sympathy and approval of Europe; by a contrary course she will draw down upon herself the universal condemnation of all disinterested men. By this course alone war in Europe can be with certainty prevented."—No. 4, 445.

Mr. Disraeli

Well, Sir, that, I think, was a bold despatch to write after the rejection, for the second or third time, of our overtures to France. That brings us up to the last day of the year.

But before I proceed to more recent transactions it is necessary to call the attention of the House to the remarkable contrast between the menaces lavished on Germany and the expectations—to use the mildest term—that were held out to Denmark. The first great object of Her Majesty's Government when the difficulties began to be very serious was to induce Denmark to revoke the Patent of Holstein—that is, to terminate its constitution. The constitution of Holstein had been granted very recently before the death of the King, with a violent desire on the part of the monarch to fulfil his promises. It was a wise and excellent constitution, by which Holstein became virtually independent. It enjoyed the fulness of self-government, and was held only by a sovereign tie to Denmark, as Norway is held to Sweden. The Danish Government were not at all willing to revoke the constitution in Holstein. It was one that did them credit, and was naturally popular in Holstein. Still, the Diet was very anxious that the Patent should be revoked, because if Holstein continued satisfied it was impossible to trade on the intimate connection between Schleswig and Holstein, the lever by which the Kingdom of Denmark was to be destroyed. The Diet, therefore, insisted that the Patent should be revoked. Her Majesty's Government, I believe, approved the Patent of Holstein, as the Danish Government had done, but as a means of obtaining peace and saving Denmark, they made use of all the means in their power to induce Denmark to revoke that constitution. Sir Augustus Paget, writing to the Foreign Secretary on the 14th of October, and describing an interview with M. Hall, the Prime Minister of Denmark, says—

"After much further conversation, in which I made use of every argument to induce his Excellency to adopt a conciliatory course, and in which I warned him of the danger of rejecting the friendly counsels now offered by Her Majesty's Government,"—No. 3, 162.

M. Hall promises to withdraw the Patent. What interpretation could M. Hall place on that interview? He was called upon to do what he knew to be distasteful, and believed to be impolitic. He is warned of the danger of rejecting those friendly counsels, and in consequence of that warning he gives way and surrenders his opinion. I would candidly ask what is the interpretation which in private life would be put on such language as I have quoted, and which had been acted upon by those to whom it was addressed?

Well, we come now to the Federal Execution in Holstein. Speaking literally, the Federal Execution was a legal act, and Denmark could not resist it. But from the manner in which it was about to be carried into effect, and in consequence of the pretensions connected with it, the Danes were of opinion that it would have been better at once to resist the execution which aimed a fatal blow at the independence of Schleswig, and upon this point they felt strongly. Well, Her Majesty's Government—and I give them full credit for being actuated by the best motives—thought otherwise and wished the Danish Government to submit to this execution. And what was the sort of language used by them in order to bring about that result? Sir Augustus Paget replied in this way to the objections of the Danish Minister—

"I replied that Denmark would at all events have a better chance of securing the assistance of the Powers if the execution were not resisted."

I ask any candid man to put his own interpretation upon this language. And on the 12th of the same month Lord Russell himself tells M. Bille, the Danish Minister in London, that there is no connection between the engagements of Denmark to Germany and the engagement of the German Powers under the Treaty of 1852. After such a declaration from the English Minister in the metropolis—a declaration which must have had the greatest effect upon the policy of the Danish Government—of course they submitted to the execution. But, having revoked the Patent and submitted to the execution, as neither the one nor the other was the real object of the German Powers, a new demand was made which was of the greatest consequence. Now, listen to this. The new demand was to repeal the whole Constitution. I want to put clearly before the House the position of the Danish Government with respect to this much talked of Constitution. There had been in the preceding year a Parliamentary Reform Bill carried in Denmark. The King died before having given his assent to it, though he was most willing to have done so. The instant the new King succeeded, the new Parliamentary Reform Bill was brought to him. Of course great excitement prevailed in Denmark, just as it did in England at the time of the Reform Bill under similar circumstances, and the King was placed in a most difficult position. Now, observe this; England, who was so obtrusive and pragmatical in the counsels which she gave, who was always offering advice and suggestions, hung back when the question arose whether the new King should give his assent to the Reform Bill or not. England was selfishly silent, and would incur no responsibility. The excitement in Copenhagen was great, and the King gave his assent to the Bill. But mark! At that moment it is not at all impossible that if Her Majesty's Government had written a despatch to Copenhagen asking the King not to give his assent to the Bill for the space of six weeks, in order to assist England in the negotiations she was carrying on in behalf of Denmark; and if the King had convened his Council and laid before them the expressed wish of an ally who was then looked upon by Denmark with confidence and hope, especially from the time that France had declared she would not assist her, I cannot doubt that the King would have complied with a request that was so important to his fortunes. But the instant the King had sanctioned the new Constitution, the English Government began writing despatches calling upon him to revoke it. [Cheers from the Ministerial Benches.] Ay, but what was his position then? How could he revoke it? The King was a constitutional King; he could have put an end to this Constitution only by a coup d'état; and he was not in a position, nor I believe if he were had he the inclination, to do such an act. The only constitutional course open to him was to call the new Parliament together, with the view of their revoking the Constitution. But see what would have been the position of affairs then. In England the Reform Act was passed in 1832, new elections took place under it, and the House assembled under Lord Althorp, as the leader of the Government. Now, suppose Lord Althorp had come down to that House with a King's speech recommending them to revoke the Reform Act, and have asked leave to introduce another Bill for the purpose of reforming the Constitution, would it not have been asking an utter impossibility? But how did Her Majesty's Government act towards Denmark in similar circumstances? First of all, the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office wrote to Lord Wodehouse on the 20th of December giving formal advice to the Danish Government to repeal the Constitution, and Lord Wodehouse, who had been sent upon this painful and, I must say, impossible office to the Danish Minister, thus speaks of the way in which he had performed his task—

"I pointed out to M. Hall also that if, on the one hand, Her Majesty's Government would never counsel the Danish Government to yield anything inconsistent with the honour and independence of the Danish Crown, and the integrity of the King's dominions; so, on the other hand, we had a right to expect that the Danish Government would not, by putting forward extreme pretensions, drive matters to extremities."

And Sir Augustus Paget, who appears to have performed his duty with great temper and talent, writing on the 22nd of December, says—

"I asked M. Hall to reflect what would be the position of Denmark if the advice of the Powers were refused, and what it would be if accepted, and to draw his own conclusions."—No. 4, 420.

Now, I ask, what are the conclusions which any Gentleman—I do not care on what side of the House he may sit—would have drawn from such language as that? But before that a special interview took place between Lord Wodehouse and the Danish Minister, of which Lord Wodehouse writes—

"It was my duty to declare to M. Hall that if the Danish Government rejected our advice, Her Majesty's Government must leave Denmark to encounter Germany on her own responsibility."

Well, Sir, I ask again whether there are two interpretations to be put upon such observations as these? And what happened? It was impossible for M. Hall, who was the author of the Constitution, to put an end to it; so he resigned—a new Government is formed, and under the new Constitution Parliament is absolutely called together to pass an Act to terminate its own existence. And in January, Sir Augustus Paget tells the Danish Government with some naïveté

"If they would summon the Rigsgaad, and propose the repeal of the Constitution, they would act wisely, in accordance with the advice of their friends, and the responsibility of the war would not be laid at their door."

Well, then, these were three great subjects on which the representation of England induced Denmark to adopt a course against her will, and, as the Danes believed, against their policy. The plot begins to thicken. Notwithstanding the revocation of the Patent, the Federal execution, and the repeal of the Constitution, one thing more is wanted, and Schleswig is about to be invaded. Affairs now become most critical. No sooner is this known than a very haughty menace is sent to Austria. From a despatch of Lord Bloomfield, dated December 31, it will be seen that Austria was threatened, if Schleswig was invaded, that—

"The consequences would be serious. The question would cease to be a purely German one, and would become one of European importance."

On the 4th of January, Earl Russell writes to Mr. Murray, at the Court of Saxony—

"The most serious consequences are to be apprehended if the Germans invade Schleswig."—No. 4, 481.

On the 9th again he writes to Dresden—

"The line taken by Saxony destroys confidence in diplomatic relations with that state."—No. 4, 502.

On the 18th of January, he writes to Lord Bloomfield—

"You are instructed to represent in the strongest terms to Count Rechberg, and, if you shall have an opportunity of doing so, to the Emperor, the extreme injustice and danger of the principle and practice of taking possession of the territory of a State as what is called a material guarantee for the obtainment of certain international demands, instead of pressing those demands by the usual method of negotiation. Such a practice is fatal to peace, and destructive of the independence of States. It is destructive of peace because it is an act of war, and if resistance takes place it is the beginning of war. But war so begun may not be confined within the narrow limits of its early commencement, as was proved in 1853, when the occupation of the Danubian Principalities by Russia as a material guarantee proved the direct cause of the Crimean war."—No. 4, 564.

It is only because I do not wish to weary the House that I do not read it all, but it is extremely well written. ["Read."] Well, then, the despatch goes on to say—

"Such a practice is most injurious to the independence and integrity of the States to which it is applied, because a territory so occupied can scarcely be left by the occupying force in the same state in which it was when the occupation took place. But, moreover, such a practice may recoil upon those who adopt it, and, in the ever-varying course of events, it may be most inconveniently applied to those who, having set the example, had flattered themselves it never could be applied to them."—No. 4, 564.

Well, the invasion of Schleswig is impending and then an identic note is sent to Vienna and Berlin in these terms—

"Her Majesty's Government having been informed that the Governments of Austria and Prussia have addressed a threatening summons to Denmark, the undersigned has been instructed to ask for a formal declaration on the part of those Governments that they adhere to the principle of the integrity of the Danish monarchy."—No. 4, 565.

And again, writing to Lord Bloomfield, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs speaks of the invasion as "a breach of faith which may entail upon Europe widespread calamities." But all these remonstrances were in vain. Notwithstanding these solemn warnings, notwithstanding this evidence that in the German Courts the just influence of England was lowered, the invasion of Schleswig takes place—And what is the conduct of the Government? They hurry again to Paris. They propose a joint declaration of the non-German Powers. Earl Russell writes to Lord Cowley in the middle of January. An answer was sent, I believe, the next day, the 14th; and this is Lord Cowley's statement in reference to the opinion of the French Government—

"As to the four Powers impressing upon the Diet the heavy responsibility that it would incur if, by any precipitate measures, it were to break the peace of Europe before the Conference which had been proposed by the British Government for considering the means of settling the question between Germany and Denmark, and thereby maintaining that peace, can be assembled, M. Drouyn de Lhuys observed that he had not forgotten that when Russia had been warned by France, Great Britain, and Austria of the responsibility which she was incurring by her conduct towards Poland, Prince Gortschakoff had replied, 'that Russia was ready to assume that responsibility before God and man.' He, for one, did not wish to provoke another answer of the same sort to be received with the same indifference."—No. 4, 536.

The drama now becomes deeply interesting. The events are quick. That is the answer of the French Government; and on the next day Lord Russell writes to Lord Cowley to propose concert and co-operation with France to maintain the treaty—that is, to prevent the occupation of Schleswig. Lord Cowley writes the next day to Lord Russell that the French Government want to know what "concert and co-operation" mean. Lord Russell at last, on January 24, writes to say that concert and co-operation mean, "if necessary, material assistance to Denmark." That must have been about the same time when the Cabinet was sitting to draw up Her Majesty's Speech, assuring Parliament that negotiations continued to be carried on in the interest of peace. Now, Sir, what was the answer of the French Government; when, at last, England invited her to go to war to settle the questions between Germany and Denmark? I will read the reply—

"M. Drouyn de Lhuys, after recapitulating the substance of my despatch of the 24th of January to your Excellency, explains very clearly the views of the French Government upon the subject. The Emperor recognizes the value of the London Treaty as tending to preserve the balance of power and maintain the peace of Europe. But the Government of France, while paying a just tribute to the purport and objects of the Treaty of 1852, is ready to admit that circumstances may require its modification. The Emperor has always been disposed to pay great regard to the feelings and aspirations of nationalities. It is not to be denied that the national feelings and aspirations of Germany tend to a closer connection with the Germans of Holstein and Schleswig. The Emperor would feel repugnance to any course which should bind him to oppose in arms the wishes of Germany. It may be comparatively easy for England to carry on a war which can never go beyond maritime operations of blockade and capture of ships. Schleswig and England are far apart from each other. But the soil of Germany touches the soil of France, and a war between France and Germany would be one of the most burdensome and one of the most hazardous in which the French Empire could engage. Besides these considerations, the Emperor cannot fail to recollect that he has been made an object of mistrust and suspicion in Europe on account of his supposed projects of aggrandizement on the Rhine. A war commenced on the frontiers of Germany could not fail to give strength to these unfounded and unwarrantable imputations. For these reasons, the Government of the Emperor will not take at present any engagement on the subject of Denmark. If, hereafter, the balance of power should be seriously threatened, the Emperor may be inclined to take new measures in the interest of France and of Europe. But for the present the Emperor reserves to his Government entire liberty."—No. 4, 620.

Well, Sir, I should think that, after the reception of that despatch, though it might have been very hard to convince the Foreign Secretary of the fact, any other person might easily have suspected that the just influence of England was lowered in another quarter of Europe.

Sir, I have now brought events to the period when Parliament met, trespassing, I fear, too much on the indulgence of the House; but hon. Members will remember that, in order to give this narrative to-day, it was necessary for me to peruse 1,500 printed folio pages, and I trust I have done no more than advert to those passages to which it was requisite to direct attention in order that the House might form a complete and candid opinion of the case. I will not dwell, or only for the slightest possible time, on what occurred upon the meeting of Parliament. Sir, when we met there were no papers; and I remember that when I asked for papers there was not, I will frankly say, on both sides of the House, a sufficient sense of the very great importance of the occasion and of the singular circumstance that the papers were not presented to us. It turned out afterwards, from what fell from the Secretary of State in another place, that it was never intended that the papers should be presented at the meeting of Parliament. The noble Lord at the head of the Government treated the inquiry for papers in a jaunty way, and said, "Oh! you shall have papers, and I wish you joy of them." That was the tone of the First Minister in reference to the most important diplomatic correspondence ever laid before Parliament since the rupture of the Treaty of Amiens: but we are all now aware of the importance of these transactions. It was weeks—months almost—before we became masters of the case, but during the interval the most disastrous circumstances occurred, showing the increased peril and danger of Denmark and the successes of the invaders of her territory. We all remember their entrance into Jutland. We all remember the inquiries which were made on the subject and the assurances which were given. But it was impossible for the House to pronounce any opinion, because the papers were not before it, and the moment we had the papers the Conference was announced. One word with respect to the Conference. I never was of opinion that the Conference would arrive at any advantageous result, I could not persuade myself, after reading the papers, that, whatever might be the cause, any one seriously wished for a settlement, except, of course, Her Majesty's Ministers, and they had a reason for it. The Conference lasted six weeks. It wasted six weeks. It lasted as long as a Carnival, and, like a Carnival, it was an affair of masks and mystification. Our Ministers went to it as men in distressed circumstances go to a place of amusement—to while away the time, with a consciousness of impending failure. However, the summary of the Conference is this—that Her Majesty's Government made two considerable proposals. They proposed, first, the dismemberment of Denmark. So much for its integrity. They proposed, in the second place, that the remainder of Denmark should be placed under the joint guarantee of the great Powers. They would have created another Turkey in Europe, in the same geographical relation, the scene of the same rival intrigues, and the same fertile source of constant misconceptions and wars. So much for the independence of Denmark. These two propositions having been made—the one disastrous to the integrity, and the other to the independence of Denmark—the Conference, nevertheless, even with these sacrifices offered, was a barren failure.

And I now wish to ask—after having, I hope, with some clearness and in a manner tolerably comprehensive, placed the case before hon. Members—what is their opinion of the management of these affairs by Her Majesty's Government? I showed you that the beginning of this interference was a treaty, by which England entered into obligations as regards Denmark not different from those of France. I have shown you, on the evidence of the Secretary of State, that the present position of France with respect to Denmark is one quite magnanimous, free from all difficulties and disgrace. I have shown you, I think, what every man indeed feels, that the position of England under this treaty, on the contrary, is most embarrassing, surrounded with difficulties, and full of humiliation. I have stated my opinion that the difference between the position of England and that of France arose from the mismanagement of our affairs. That appeared to me to be the natural inference and logical deduction. I have given you a narrative of the manner in which our affairs have been conducted, and now I ask you what is your opinion? Do you see in the management of those affairs that capacity, and especially that kind of capacity that is adequate to the occasion? Do you find in it that sagacity, that prudence, that dexterity, that quickness of perception, and those conciliatory moods which we are always taught to believe necessary in the transaction of our foreign affairs? Is there to be seen that knowledge of human nature, and especially that peculiar kind of science most necessary in these affairs—an acquaintance with the character of foreign countries and of the chief actors in the scene? Sir, for my part, I find all these qualities wanting; and, in consequence of the want of these qualities, I see that three results have accrued. The first is that the avowed policy of Her Majesty's Government has failed. The second is, that our just influence in the councils of Europe has been lowered. Thirdly, in consequence of our just influence in the councils of Europe being lowered, the securities for peace are diminished. These are three results which have followed in consequence of the want of the qualities to which I have alluded, and in consequence of the management of these affairs by the Government. Sir, I need not, I think, trouble the House with demonstrating that the Government have failed in their avowed policy of upholding the independence and integrity of Denmark. The first result may be thrown aside. I come, therefore, to the second. By the just influence of England in the councils of Europe I mean an influence contradistinguished from that which is obtained by intrigue and secret understanding—I mean an influence that results from the conviction of foreign Powers that our resources are great and that our policy is moderate and steadfast. Since the settlement that followed the great revolutionary war England, who obtained at that time—as she deserved to do, for she bore the brunt of the struggle—who obtained at that time all the fair objects of her ambition, has on the whole followed a Conservative foreign policy. I do not mean by a Conservative foreign policy a foreign policy that would disapprove, still less oppose, the natural development of nations. I mean a foreign policy interested in the tranquillity and prosperity of the world, the normal condition of which is peace, and which does not ally itself with the revolutionary party of Europe. Other countries have their political systems and public objects, as England had, though they may not have attained them. She is not to look upon them with unreasonable jealousy. The position of England in the councils of Europe is essentially that of a moderating and mediatorial Power. Her interest and her policy are, when changes are inevitable and necessary, to assist so that these changes, if possible, may be accomplished without war; or, if war occurs, that its duration and its asperity may be lessened. That is what I mean by the just influence of England in the councils of Europe. It appears to me that just influence of England in the councils of Europe has been lowered. Within twelve months we have been twice repulsed at St. Petersburg. Twice have we supplicated in vain at Paris. We have menaced Austria, and Austria has allowed our menaces to pass her like the idle wind. We have threatened Prussia, and Prussia has defied us. Our objurgations have rattled over the head of the German Diet, and the German Diet has treated them with contempt. Again, Sir, during the last few months there is scarcely a form of diplomatic interference which has not been suggested or adopted by the English Government—except a Congress. Conferences at Vienna, at Paris, at London—all have been proposed; protocols, joint declarations, sole mediation, joint mediation; identic notes, sole notes, united notes—everything has been tried. Couriers from the Queen have been scouring Europe with the exuberant fertility of abortive projects. After the termination of a most important Conference, held in the capital of the Queen, over which the Chief Minister of Her Majesty's foreign relations presided, and which was attended with all the pomp and ceremony requisite for so great an occasion, we find that its sittings have been perfectly barren; and the Chief Ministers of the Cabinet closed the proceedings by quitting the scene of their exertions, and appearing in the two Houses of Parliament to tell the country that they have no allies, and that as they have no allies they can do nothing. Pardon me, I must not omit to do justice to the exulting boast of the Secretary of State, who, in the midst of discomfiture, finds solace in the sympathy and politeness of the neutral Powers. I do not grudge Lord Russell the sighs of Russia or the smiles of France; but I regret that, with characteristic discretion, he should have quitted the battle of the Conference only to take his seat in the House of Lords, to denounce the perfidy of Prussia, and to mourn over Austrian fickleness. There wanted but one touch to complete the picture, and it was supplied by the noble Lord the First Minister. Sir, I listened with astonishment [Cheers]—I listened with astonishment as the noble Lord condemned the vices of his victim, and inveighed at the last moment against the obstinacy of unhappy Denmark. Denmark would not submit to arbitration. But on what conditions did the German Powers accept it? And what security had Denmark that if in the Conference she could not obtain an assurance that the neutral Powers would support her by force on the line of the Schlei—what security, I say, had she that any other line would be maintained—an unknown line by an unknown arbiter? Sir, it does appear to me impossible to deny, under these circumstances, that the just influence of England in the councils of

[First Night.

Europe is lowered. And now, I ask, what are the consequences of the just influence of England in the councils of Europe being lowered? The consequences are—to use a familiar phrase in the despatches—“most serious,” because in exact proportion as that influence is lowered the securities for peace are diminished. I lay this down as a great principle which cannot be controverted in the management of our foreign affairs. If England is resolved upon a particular policy, war is not probable. If there is, under these circumstances, a cordial alliance between England and France, war is most difficult; but if there is a thorough understanding between England, France, and Russia, war is impossible. These were the happy conditions under which Her Majesty's Ministers entered office, and which they enjoyed when they began to move in the question of Denmark. Two years ago, and even less, there was a cordial understanding between England, France, and Russia upon this question or any question which might arise between Germany and Denmark. What cards to play! What advantages in the management of affairs! It seemed, indeed, that they might reasonably look forward to a future which would justify the confidence of Parliament; when they might point with pride to what they had accomplished, and appeal to public opinion to support them. But what has happened? They have alienated Russia—they have estranged France—and then they call Parliament together to declare war against Germany. Why, such a thing never happened before in the history of this country. Nay, more, I do not think it can ever happen again. It is one of those portentous results which occur now and then to humiliate and depress the pride of nations, and to lower our confidence in human intellect. Well, Sir, as the difficulties increase, as the obstacles are multiplied, as the consequences of their perpetual errors and constant mistakes are gradually becoming more apparent, you always find Her Majesty's Government nearer war. As in private life, we know it is the weak who are always violent, so it is with Her Majesty's Ministers. As long as they are confident in their allies, as long as they possess the cordial sympathy of the great Powers, they speak with moderation, they counsel with dignity; but, like all incompetent men, when they are in extreme difficulty they can see but one resource, and that is force. When affairs cannot be
